With reference to the constitutional amendment, let me refer you to the case of Regents of State University v. Trapp, State Auditor (28 Okla., 83; 113 Pac., 910).

As I stated to you in the former letter, the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania has held the governor may reduce items, and such items as reduced will stand unless repassed by two-thirds majority.

See also Fergus v. Russel (270 Ill., 304; 110 N. E.), at the bottom of page 147, wherein it is said:

"Under the contention of the governor the legislature is given a choice, upon receipt of the veto message, not contemplated by the constitution—that of passing the item partially disapproved over the veto of the governor or of accepting an appropriation it had not made and had not intended should be made. This would result in an invasion by the governor of the functions of the legislative department (State v. Holder, 76 Miss., 158; 23 South., 643). While it is true that in one sense the governor, when engaged in considering bills, is acting in a legislative capacity, and is for that purpose a part of the legislative department of the State (Fowler v. Peirce, 2 Calif., 172; Lukens v. Nye, 156 Calif., 498; 105 Pac., 593; 36 L. R. A. (N. S.), 244; 20 Ann. Cas., 158; People v. Bowen, 21 N. Y., 521), he is exercising only a qualified and destructive legislative function and not a creative legislative power (State v. Holder, supra). The governor, as one of the executive department, is forbidden to exercise any legislative function except that expressly provided by the constitution. Under the provisions of the constitution he can never exercise a creative legislative power. The contrary view is taken in Pennsylvania, where it is held in Commonwealth v. Barnett (199 Pa., 161; 48 Atl., 976; 55 L. R. A., 882) that the governor may disapprove a part of an item appropriated; but the holding is based upon a provision of the Constitution of Pennsylvania which is construed to use the words 'item' and 'part' interchangeably and in the same sense. As will be noted, our constitution permits of no such construction, as the words 'item' and 'sections' alone are used as signifying the portions of an appropriation bill which may be approved or disapproved."

I thought I would call your attention to these cases, as they might be of some service to you when you have the matter up before the committee.

Yours, very truly, R. L. WILLIAMS.

The governor of South Dakota has authority to disapprove any item or appropriation contained in appropriation bills.

EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
STATE OF SOUTH DAKOTA,
Pierre, December 10, 1919.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Acknowledging your letter of December 4, addressed to Gov. Norbeck, it is my pleasure to inform you that in South Dakota the governor has authority to disapprove of any item or appropriation contained in appropriation bills. Also those items not disapproved continue in force and effect according to the original provision of the bill.

Sincerely, yours,

KENNETH SELLERS, Secretary.

Gov. Cooper, of South Carolina, quotes a section of the State constitution showing that he has authority to veto any item or section in any bill.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Columbia, December 11, 1919.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: In answer to your letter of December 4, I shall quote a provision of the South Carolina constitution:

"Section 23, Article IV.

"* * * Bills appropriating money out of the Treasury shall specify the objects and purposes for which the same are made and appropriate to them respectively their several amounts in distinct items and sections. If the governor shall not approve any one or more of the items or sections contained in any bill, but shall approve of the residue thereof, it shall become a law as to the residue in like manner as if he had signed it. The governor shall then return the bill with his objections to the items or sections of the same not approved by him to the house in which the bill originated, which house shall enter the objections at large upon its journal and proceed to reconsider so much of said bill as is not approved by the governor. The same proceedings shall be had in both houses in reconsidering the same as is provided in case of an entire bill returned by the governor with his objections; and if any item or section of said bill not approved by the governor shall be passed by two-thirds of each house of the general assembly it shall become a part of said law notwithstanding the objections of the governor. * * *."

I trust this will give you the information you desire.

Cordially, yours,

R. A. COOPER, Governor.

The governor of Utah quotes a part of the State constitution to the effect that he has authority to veto any item in an appropriation bill:

STATE OF UTAH,
EXECUTIVE OFFICE,
Salt Lake City, December 9, 1919.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Pursuant to the request in your letter of December 4, I am quoting that part of section 8, article 7, of the constitution of the State of Utah bearing upon legislation involving appropriations:

"If any bill presented to the governor contain several items of appropriations of money, he may object to one or more such items, while approving other portions of the bill; in such case he shall append to the bill at the time of signing it, a statement of the item or items which he declines to approve, together with his reasons therefor, and such item or items shall not take effect unless passed over the governor's objection as in this section provided."

Very truly, yours,

O. J. GRIMES,
Secretary.

Gov. Clement, of Vermont, states that the commission to propose amendments to the State constitution are giving consideration to an amendment giving him authority to veto items in an appropriation bill:

STATE OF VERMONT,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Montpelier, December 15, 1919.

W. W. HASTINGS,
Chairman Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department, House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: I am directed by Gov. Clement to reply to your letter relative to a proposed amendment to the constitution providing for a veto of items in an appropriation bill. In this State there is now no such provision, but the commission to propose amendments to the State constitution are giving consideration to such a provision to submit to the next Vermont Legislature, which meets in January, 1921.

Respectfully, yours,

HARVEY E. GOODELL.

The governor of Virginia has the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill.

COMMONWEALTH OF VIRGINIA,
GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Richmond, December 8, 1919.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Replying to your letter of December 4 addressed to Gov. Davis, I take pleasure in informing you that section 76 of the constitution of Virginia carries the following power:

"The governor shall have the power to veto any particular item or items of an appropriation bill, but the veto shall not affect the item or items to which he does not object. The item or items objected to shall not take effect except in the manner heretofore provided in this section as to bills returned to the general assembly without his approval."

Items of an appropriation bill and other bills may be passed over the governor's veto by a two-thirds vote of each house, including a majority of the members elected to each house.

I am inclosing a copy of the Virginia budget law, also a pamphlet discussing the advantages of our law, which I trust will give you the information desired. We are just in the midst of the preparation of the first biennial budget under the new law, which we hope to have ready for distribution by the 15th of January.

Yours, very truly,

LE ROY HODGES,
Aide to the Governor.

The governor of West Virginia states that there is a provision in the constitution for a budget system:

STATE OF WEST VIRGINIA,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Charleston, December 8, 1919.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Replying to your communication of December 4, in which you inquire as to whether there is a provision in the West Virginia constitution providing for a budget, I beg to answer in the affirmative and to inclose herewith amendment to the constitution submitted to the voters of the State by the legislature after I came into office and adopted by the electorate of this State in the November, 1918, election. It also affords me pleasure to inclose herewith copy of the 1919 budget and budget bill, the first submitted not only during my term of office but in the State following the adoption of the constitutional amendment in November, 1918.

Yours, very truly, JOHN J. CORNWELL, Governor.

The State of Wisconsin for six or eight years has enjoyed the benefits of a budget system and favors giving the governor the power to veto separate items:

EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Madison, Wis., December 12, 1919.

Hon. W. W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. HASTINGS: Gov. Philipp directs me to acknowledge receipt of your favor of the 4th instant, in which you call attention to the bill pending before Congress providing for a Federal budget.

The governor is greatly interested in this question and believes thoroughly in the plan which you outline. For a period of six or eight years Wisconsin has enjoyed the benefits of a budget system. While we have no provision that permits the governor to eliminate any particular item from the bill that may have passed the two houses, we endeavor to take care of this situation by separating all appropriations; that is, a separate bill is introduced to cover each and every appropriation called for. There are many arguments in favor of permitting the executive to eliminate items from the bill that may be presented to him.

The budget system in Wisconsin has proved very advantageous. Prior to the convening of the legislature the State board of public affairs prepares a budget which shows the expenditures by each department or institution covering a period of the past four years; the request of the department for the next biennium is included, together with the recommendation of the State board of public affairs upon the advisability of granting the appropriation requested.

The board of public affairs makes a thorough study of the requirements and needs of the departments and institutions, and is in a position to give valuable advice and suggestions to the legislature when the appropriations are being considered. The fact that a comparison of yearly expenditures can readily be made has proven to be most helpful. While Wisconsin's budget system may not be perfect in all its details, it is such a long step ahead of the old system that we would not think of abandoning it.

I look forward to the time when we shall have a Federal budget system.

Yours, truly, L. C. WHITTET, Secretary.

Gov. Carey, of Wyoming, states that the constitution gives him the right to veto any item or items or part or parts of any bill making appropriations of money or property embracing distinct items. I invite attention to the last paragraph of his letter commending the veto provision:

THE STATE OF WYOMING,
EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,
Cheyenne, December 8, 1919.

Hon. WILLIAM W. HASTINGS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Your letter of December 4 relative to the national budget received.

I note the amendment which you have made to section 7, article 1, authorizing the President to disapprove any item in the appropriation bill. I am much in favor of this amendment for the reason that I think it wrong to force the President of the United States to sign any bill which contains items which he can not approve, and also to cause him to perhaps veto an entire bill on account of some items of which he does not approve.

Article 4, section 9, of the Wyoming constitution gives the governor the right to veto items in appropriation bills. This section is as follows:

"The governor shall have power to disapprove of any item or items or part or parts of any bill making appropriations of money or property embracing distinct items, and the part or parts of the bill approved shall be the law, and the item or items and part or parts disapproved shall be void unless enacted in the following manner: If the legislature be in session, he shall transmit to the house in which the bill originated a copy of the item or items or part or parts thereof disapproved, together with his objections thereto, and the items or parts objected to shall be separately reconsidered, and each item or part shall then take the same course as is prescribed for the passage of bills over the executive veto."

I have made use of this section on a number of occasions, and believe by doing so I have been able to save unnecessary expenditures. Further, under the powers conferred by this section, I have cut down the amount of individual appropriations to what I thought was justified. I know of one other governor of the State, and there are perhaps others, who has pursued this same course.

Very truly, yours, ROBERT D. CAREY.

These letters are from governors of the States who have had experience with appropriations for expenditures. It will be seen without exception they commend the budget system and this proposed amendment to the national Constitution. Their opinions are entitled to every consideration by Members of the House and members of the Judiciary Committee.

Every item making an appropriation of public funds should be closely scrutinized and the officials asking for the money should be required to justify the same, beginning with the heads of bureaus, Cabinet officers, and the bureau of the budget. There is no reason why the President should not have the power proposed to be conferred upon him by this amendment. No item ought to be included in an appropriation bill that can not be justified upon its own merits. The very fact that the President has the power to veto separate items will have a splendid effect in keeping items of doubtful merit out of appropriation bills.

The people are rightfully demanding economy. We are trying to reduce the cost of living. We are reducing our personal expenditures in every way. Our municipal governments and our State legislatures are economizing in every possible way. The Congress of the United States should set an example to the people of the country and to the various States pointing the way by which expenditures can be reduced.

This proposed amendment, it seems to me, needs no argument in its behalf. It will commend itself favorably, I am sure, to everyone who gives it thoughtful consideration. That such a provision has reduced expenditures in the various States where this power is given the governor there is no question, and that it will have a beneficial effect in reducing Federal expenditures, if adopted, I do not have the slightest doubt.

I want to invite the attention of the chairman of the House Judiciary Committee [Mr. VOLSTEAD] to it, and to press upon him the importance of its early consideration by his committee. I also want to invite the attention of the chairman of the Appropriation Committee [Mr. GOOD] to it, because in the last few months he has made a number of speeches in the interest of economy and reduction of public expenditures. I feel sure that when he carefully considers this proposed amendment, I shall have his hearty cooperation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Oklahoma has expired.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, has the gentleman from Oklahoma used his entire 15 minutes?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes. Two minutes of the time remain.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, if the committee will permit, I desire to make a brief statement during this two-minute period.

In the first place, I am a member of no committee that has devoted as much time to the consideration of any one bill of this character as has been devoted to the bill under consideration. In the first place, both the Senators from the State of Montana appeared before the committee last October urging this legislation. The bill had already passed the Senate, and the House Committee on Indian Affairs, after having listened to a number of Indians from the reservation, decided to report the bill with certain amendments. The bill went upon the calendar, and after remaining there some time objection arose to the bill on the part of certain Indians on the reservation. Those Indians sent a delegation to Washington, and the chairman of our committee accorded that delegation an additional hearing. As the result of that hearing, the chairman of the committee withdrew the bill. The committee again considered the bill and reported it unanimously with the amendments agreed upon, which have been printed as a part of the bill now before the committee.

I desire to say, too, Mr. Chairman, that this is a very important piece of legislation, because the bill, if the committee understands the true situation, has the approval of the Crow Indians, and these Indians have reached that condition of progress and development when they should have turned over to them their property and be allowed to administer their own affairs.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired. All time has expired. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to cause to be allotted the surveyed lands and such unsurveyed lands as lie north of the line between townships 5 and 6 south, together with such unsurveyed lands contiguous to those now surveyed and within 2 miles therefrom as the commission hereinafter provided for may find to be suitable for allotment within the Crow Indian Reservation in Montana, not herein reserved as hereinafter provided, among the members of the Crow Tribe, as follows, namely, 160 acres to the heirs of every enrolled member, entitled to allotment, who died unallotted after December 31, 1905, and before the passage of this act; next, 160 acres to every allotted member living at the date of the passage of this act, who may then be the head of a family and has not received allotment as such head of a family; and thereafter to prorate the remaining unallotted allottable lands and allot them so that every enrolled member living on the date of the passage of this act and entitled to allotment shall receive in the aggregate an equal share of the allottable tribal lands for his total allotment of land of the Crow Tribe. Allotments made hereunder shall vest title in the allottee, subject only to existing tribal leases, which leases in no event shall be renewed or extended by the Secretary of the Interior after the passage of this act, and shall as hereinafter provided be evidenced by patents in fee to competent Indians, except as to homesteads as hereinafter provided, but by trust patent to minors and incompetent Indians, the force and legal effect of the trust patents to be as is prescribed by the general allotment act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stats., p. 388). Priority of selection, up to 325 acres, is hereby given to the members of the tribe who have as yet received no allotment on the Crow Reservation, and thereafter all members enrolled for allotment hereunder shall in all respects be entitled to equal rights and privileges, as far as possible, in regard to the time, manner, and amount of their respective selections: Provided, That Crow Indians who are found to be competent may elect, in writing, to have their allotments, except as herein provided, patented to them in fee. Otherwise trust patents shall be issued to them. No patent in fee shall be issued for lands of a husband unless the wife joins in the application, who shall be examined separately and apart from her husband and a certificate of the officer taking her acknowledgment shall fully set forth compliance with this requirement.

With committee amendments, as follows:

On page 1, after the word "lands," on line 5, strike out the words "as lie north of the line between townships 5 and 6 south, together with such unsurveyed lands contiguous to those now surveyed and within 2 miles therefrom."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman wait until we adopt the other committee amendments to the section?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 17, after the word "allottee," insert "at the time of making selection and reporting the selection to the agency office."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. This will make the language read, "Allotments made hereunder shall vest title in the allottee at the time of making selection and reporting the selection to the agency office." Now, there may be a difference of time between those two events. You might make a selection one day and the report might not be made to the agency office for some little time thereafter. When would the title vest in such a case?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to state, it was necessary to fix some time when the title was supposed to vest, and no better time was thought of than the time referred to in the amendment.

Mr. WALSH. There may be two different times. They may make a selection to-day, and it might not be reported for some days thereafter.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will yield, when he goes to the office to select it he reports. He makes the selection and he makes the report.

Mr. WALSH. Then he can not make the selection at one office and the report at another?

Mr. HASTINGS. It is all done at one and the same office.

Mr. WALSH. He goes to that office?

Mr. HASTINGS. He goes to the agency office of that tribe.

Mr. RHODES. I think the gentleman misinterpreted the language, because the committee understood that there was no question but the proper time for the title to vest was the time when the selection was made—the date of the selection.

Mr. HASTINGS. He makes that selection through that particular agent.

Mr. WALSH. At that office?

Mr. HASTINGS. At that office.

Mr. WALSH. And not outside in the field?

Mr. HASTINGS. Not outside in the field. He makes it at that particular office of that agent, and the two things are done at one and the same time.

Mr. WALSH. There are two transactions, though, are there not?

Mr. HASTINGS. He has to make his selection, and to go to this office, where a record is made of it. He has not made any selection until it is recorded. He does the two things at the agency.

Mr. WALSH. I am satisfied with the gentleman's explanation, but I did not want any misapprehension about the language.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 13, after the word "for," insert the word "homestead."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. For fear that some of our constituents might drop in this evening and go away with the wrong impression about the House of Representatives sitting in Committee of the Whole, I would like to remark for their benefit that there is a reason for only about 14 Congressmen being present here this evening. We usually have 20. We ought to have 8 more here than there are now, but I do not want any of our constituents to go away thinking that we have only about 14 here every day, because we do have 7 or 8 more. But there is a good reason for those 7 or 8 being away, because after my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] threw such a bomb into the ranks of our friends over there on the Republican side, I do not blame them for congregating their men outside somewhere in consultation. You know it is a very important case they have got to pass on. They have been 11 long months trying to diagnose it, and they have not diagnosed it yet.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. TILSON. I remember that on one occasion the gentleman found fault with my arithmetic when I occupied the chair.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman's arithmetic is always correct except when he is counting a quorum.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman refers to 14 Members present. I have not attempted to count the gentlemen on the Democratic side, but if my count is correct there are 19 gentlemen on the Republican side. I will leave the gentleman from Texas to count the number on the Democratic side.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, well, the gentleman from Connecticut has pushed the button and brought them in from the cloakroom and the byways and the highways, and of course he has found a few more.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman can easily count those on the Democratic side. There are just three.

Mr. BLANTON. They make up in quality what they lack in quantity. [Laughter.] There are enough Democrats here to take care of the Republicans who are present.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield for an interruption?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I expect now every gentleman who is here will stand up, so that his constituents may know that he is present, so that he will not be considered absent inferentially.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to the distinguished gentleman from Kansas.

Mr. WHITE of Kansas. It can not be that the gentleman feels that the Republicans appreciate his remarks more than the Democrats do, as a reason why there are so few Democrats here?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, our Democratic friends are trying their best right now to solve problems that you gentlemen ought to have solved 11 long months ago, since you first met here—May 19, 1919—when you took charge of the reins of government in Congress. The people have been depending on you, and you Republicans have been weighed in the balance and found wanting.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 18, after the word "of," insert "agricultural and irrigable."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 20, after the word "person," insert "company, or corporation."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 21, after the word "owns," strike out "at least" and insert "at the time of approval more than."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 22, after the word "of," insert "agricultural or irrigated."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 24, after the word "reservation," insert "nor shall any sale be made by any Indian to any person, company, or corporation of more than 640 acres of agricultural or irrigated land."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 4, line 9, after the word "imprisonment," insert "and no land shall be sold or offered for sale by any Crow Indian upon which there is an unexpired lease. Any sale made in violation of this provision shall be void: Provided, That the limitation made as to agricultural and irrigable land shall not apply to grazing land."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to discuss the committee amendment.

I should like to ask the gentleman in charge of the measure if there is any defined distinction of record in the Indian Office or elsewhere between grazing land, irrigable land, and agricultural land? Might not grazing land come within the classification of irrigable land?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I will state for the information of the gentleman that these lands have been classified, and there is a well-known classification and record of the same in the Indian Office. The lands upon that reservation, as well as those upon all the other larger reservations, have been classified into irrigable lands, grazing lands, and agricultural lands, which I assume are comprehended within this general classification. That was done for the purpose of carrying into effect the legislation provided for through irrigation schemes and projects on the reservation. This language was agreed upon as proper language to go into the bill under the facts and existing law, to which the Indian Office gave full assent.

Mr. WALSH. Is there also a definition and classification in the Indian Office of agricultural land?

Mr. RHODES. I am not prepared to say whether there is a legal definition of the term "agricultural lands," but I do know there is such a classification.

Mr. WALSH. In the Indian Office?

Mr. RHODES. In the Indian Office. Furthermore, more than 30,000 acres of agricultural land on this reservation has gone under long-term leases made in pursuance of a contract entered into by the Indian Office and one J. M. Campbell, representing large agricultural interests. These lands have been reduced to agriculture and are being used as such in conformity with the rules and regulations of the Indian Office and the contract.

Mr. WALSH. That being so, I would like to ask what the purpose is of taking grazing lands out of the limitation that applies to agricultural and irrigable lands.

Mr. RHODES. I do not know what particular purpose the gentleman anticipates in asking this question, but I do know that under existing law and under these long-term leases the agricultural lands are under 10-year leases in many cases, and the grazing lands are only under 5-year leases. I know, further, that there is a difference between the income which the agricultural lands are supposed to yield and the income which the grazing lands are supposed to yield. One carries a much higher per acre rental than the other. I am sure there is sufficient justification for it.

Mr. WALSH. If I understand the language of the committee amendment, it will permit the conveyance of grazing lands held by the Crow Indians being conveyed to companies or corporations who own more than 640 acres within the present boundaries of the reservation.

Mr. RHODES. I see the situation that the gentleman has in mind. The reason for that is this: It is not practicable to lease small areas for grazing purposes. Therefore the only way an Indian or a lessee could use to good advantage grazing lands would be by being able to control a large acreage. Neither would a prospective buyer pay a reasonable price for grazing land unless he could obtain a large acreage. In other words, it is not practicable to put a large number of cattle on a small area, and for that reason it is necessary to have a larger acreage, and this amendment seeks to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. WALSH. Would not you therefore prevent the grazing land from being developed as agricultural or irrigable land?

Mr. RHODES. The experience of those who have made an effort to farm on that reservation and the experience of the Indian Office is such that it is not considered practicable to attempt agriculture upon these grazing lands because of the vast acreage that lies beyond the irrigable area. In other words, there is an irrigation project—I believe two such projects—installed on this reservation, but none of these lands to which the gentleman refers are within the irrigated or irrigable area, and consequently there would be no danger in the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. There might be no danger, but the mere fact that these lands could be conveyed in such large tracts would, of course, prevent anybody from attempting to use them for agricultural purposes, because they would be held in such large areas. I was wondering if it would be wise to permit such large areas of grazing land to be taken up by a company or a corporation and thereby discourage any attempt to establish irrigation projects.

Mr. RHODES. You can establish irrigation projects on any of these lands, but at a very excessive cost. It would probably cost $200 or $300 an acre to put water on them.

Mr. HERNANDEZ. You could put water on any of these lands, but it would not be feasible. In the first place, you have to have water rights in connection with the storage of water, and unless you can put the water to good use you would not be allowed to take water from the streams on the high hills and store it.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I doubt the wisdom of the last proviso, but I shall not contest it.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, on page 4, line 5, there is evidently a misprint, and I move to amend by striking out the word "grant" and inserting the word "grantee."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 4, line 5, strike out the word "grant" and insert the word "grantee."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee whether or not the language on line 20, page 3, should not read "to any person or persons"?

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, there would be no objection to that, but I assume the word "person" would be comprehensive enough.

Mr. WATSON. In all legal documents the language is usually written "person or persons." There is no reason why five persons should not assemble together and purchase the property.

Mr. RHODES. I have no objection to that.

Mr. WATSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move that on page 3, line 20, after the word "person," the words "or persons" be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WATSON: Page 3, line 20, after the word "person," strike out the comma and insert the words "or persons."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, also the following amendment: On page 3, line 25, after the word "person," insert the words "or persons."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. WATSON: Page 3, line 25, amend the committee amendment, after the word "person," by inserting the words "or persons."

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Chairman, before that amendment is agreed to permit me to make a suggestion. The amendment, if adopted, will make the text read so that the Secretary of the Interior may not sell to any person, persons, company, or corporation more than 640 acres of agricultural land. If there were enough people, they could not sell over 640 acres to "persons," and they could not sell any at all.

Mr. WATSON. But in all legal documents the phrase reads "to any person or persons." Under the language as it was in line 20, five or six persons could jointly purchase a property from the Indians specified and still have a legal title in accordance with the law.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Possibly so. I do not particularly object to the amendment, but I am figuring that it might make some complications, so that the Secretary of the Interior might interpret it that if six people went together they could not buy, if they were interested as copartners, 640 acres of land.

Mr. WATSON. But the Indian is not permitted to sell to a company or corporation, and a company or corporation is composed of persons. The amendment is simply to prevent half a dozen persons purchasing land from the Crow Indians.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania offer the amendment?

Mr. WATSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 25, amend the committee amendment after the word "person" by inserting the words "or persons."

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, on reflection, and as a result of the suggestion by the gentleman from Montana [Mr. EVANS], I am inclined to think that this language in the bill should remain as it is. I think it a good reason; perhaps it is a matter to which the gentleman's attention has not been called. A very remarkable situation exists on that reservation. A large number of lessees are holding this land under long-term leases, and one of the objects of the committee in agreeing on this amendment was to preclude any lessee from obtaining any advantage as against any other prospective purchaser of these allotted lands after title passes to the allottee under the provisions of the act. Not only did your committee carefully consider the language, but the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs was present and scrutinized every proposed amendment, and unless the gentleman insists upon urging his amendment, and can assign some additional reason, I should insist upon the committee allowing the language to remain in the bill as it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the first amendment in line 20 has already been adopted, and he ventures the further suggestion that this is a limitation and perhaps the words "or persons" there would interfere with the meaning of the text and give it the opposite interpretation.

Mr. RHODES. Then I trust that the amendment will not be agreed to.

Mr. WATSON. Inasmuch as the first amendment has been agreed to, what procedure is necessary to restore the text as it was originally?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment just offered can be withdrawn.

Mr. WATSON. Then I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I have just offered.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the proceedings had in respect to amendment to line 20, page 3, offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. WATSON], will be vacated.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the Secretary of the Interior shall, as speedily as possible, after the passage of this act, prepare a complete roll of the members of the Crow Tribe who died unallotted after December 31, 1905, and before the passage of this act; also, a complete roll of the allotted members of the tribe who at the date hereof are living and are heads of families but have not received full allotments as such; also, a complete roll of the unallotted members of the tribe living six months after the approval of this act who are entitled to allotments. Such rolls when completed shall be deemed the final allotment rolls of the Crow Tribe, on which allotment of all tribal lands and distribution of all tribal funds existing at said date shall be made. The rolls shall show the English, as well as the Indian, name of the allottee; the age, if living; the sex, whether declared competent or incompetent; the description or descriptions of the allotments; and any other fact deemed by the Secretary of the Interior necessary or proper. Said rolls shall be completed within one year after the approval of this act.

The following committee amendments were severally reported and severally agreed to:

Page 4, line 19, strike out the word "tribe" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Crow Tribe."

Page 4, line 19, strike out the word "at" and insert the words "six months after."

Page 5, line 8, after the word "act," insert the words "and allotments shall be completed within one year and six months from the date of the approval of this act."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I offer to amend, on page 5, line 5, after the word "allotments," by inserting the words "family relationship."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 5, line 5, after the word "allotments," insert the words "family relationship."

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, a number of us have had experience in an effort to determine the heirship of deceased Indians. In another portion of the bill a very wise provision is made for the sale of inherited lands to returned soldiers who may seek to buy them or settle thereon.

Now, you are making a permanent roll of this Indian tribe, and you are requiring it to have on it the Indian names. Why not fix in the roll the relationship of these allottees by setting it out in the roll, so when you go to determine the heirship you have no trouble in having a permanent, definite rule?

Mr. FRENCH. Would not the amendment better follow the word "incompetent" in line 4 or the word "allottee" in line 3. It seems to me that it would work in better there.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is probably true as to being a better location, but the thing I had in view was to have the roll show the relationship.

Mr. FRENCH. I think it is really quite important and it should be in one place or the other because——

Mr. McKEOWN. I will ask to modify my amendment by having it follow the word "allottee" in line 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Oklahoma asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report the modified amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Modified amendment by Mr. McKEOWN: Page 5, line 3, after the word "allottee," insert the words "family relationship."

Mr. RHODES. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. RHODES. What is the object the gentleman seeks by this amendment? What would he accomplish that is not accomplished in its present form?

Mr. McKEOWN. This is the purpose. The question of the title from the heirs of these Indians is quite important because they are allotted their lands in severalty, and when one is going to purchase lands from the heirs of deceased allottees there is going to be very much less difficulty by having a permanent record of the relationship before the question as to who is the heir to a piece of land arises. Now at the time of the enrolling, before death occurs and property rights come up to influence the testimony, is the best time to put down the relationship of these allottees, in my judgment.

Mr. HASTINGS. I was going to say, if my colleague will permit me, I believe after further consideration that he would not insist on that sort of an amendment being added. If he will notice, this bill only gives the Secretary of the Interior one year in which to make this roll. Now, of course, in nine-tenths of the cases persons in making the roll would determine the family relationships, would they not? I mean without any additional testimony or without any complicated testimony being taken, but in some of these cases where the allottees are off it may be a difficult question to determine the heirs. And another thing, if my colleague will remember, you are asking them here to determine the heirships and fix that without the heirs being heard. They might want to contest that. I never have known any Indian roll that has ever been made where the heirships have ever been determined in advance.

Mr. McKEOWN. That is not a determination of the heirship. I am simply asking that the family relationship be set out on the roll, because my colleague will remember that in the Indian territory one of the difficult things to do is to determine the question of heirships, because after the allottee is dead many heirs are encouraged by a hope to secure the estate, and the question of determining the true relationship is made very difficult. But this does not determine the heirship because——

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not understand what its purpose is, then, and I can not see any other object my colleague could have than to determine the question of heirship.

Mr. McKEOWN. Because there is nothing in this act that makes this roll at this time conclusive.

Mr. HASTINGS. Oh, yes; this is final.

Mr. McKEOWN. This is final, but not conclusive as to heirship.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then you have no need of putting the language in at all unless you make it conclusive.

Mr. McKEOWN. If you are going to sell these lands of deceased allottees to soldiers, sailors, and marines, which you propose over in section 15, the question of heirship is going to arise and ought to be determined easily by the man who is going to purchase, and he ought to have some place where he can go to find out whether the party proposing to convey the land has the right.

Mr. HASTINGS. But my colleague is too good a lawyer to believe you can determine that in advance without the heirs being heard. Now, you are going to determine the heirship of people without their being heard at all.

Mr. McKEOWN. I would not undertake to determine the heirship on this roll, but you have here something definite that the prospective purchaser can see and determine himself, and I will say to my colleague that the chances are that the relationship can be more easily and more accurately set out at the time this roll is made than at a later date.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, I do not understand what my colleague means by the word "relationship." If he means to use that in the sense of determining the heirship——

Mr. McKEOWN. No.

Mr. HASTINGS. I do not believe it ought to be inserted in this bill.

Mr. McKEOWN. I want to say this: This amendment is offered to the bill at this time in the hope that it will be of some benefit to the people who are to buy these lands, and you will find in after years when this matter comes up that they will have the same difficulty that has confronted many of us who have had this same question to deal with.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, with all due deference to the opinion of the gentleman from Oklahoma, I would remind him that under existing law ample opportunity is offered for the determination of heirs. As I remember, there are two distinct provisions of law relating to this particular matter, and, in my opinion, the amendment offered by the gentleman would have the effect of complicating existing law with regard to the determination of heirship rather than to help the matter. And for that reason I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. McKEOWN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RHODES. I will.

Mr. McKEOWN. It has been decided by the Bureau of Indian Affairs that they can at any time set aside their findings, and they have done so, and men have purchased these Indian lands of deceased allottees, and 10 or 15 years after a man has gone in possession of it the department has found out it made a mistake and makes another adjudication and finds some other heir entitled to it. Now, if it became a final adjudication, and that method has become final, then it could be relied upon.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, in response to that statement, I would insist that there is a definite method of determination and a method of adjudication. Therefore I can see no special object to be accomplished.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That any names found to be on the tribal rolls fraudulently, may, upon request of the tribal council, at any time within one year from the passage of this act, be stricken therefrom by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, after giving all parties in interest a full opportunity to be heard in regard thereto; and any allotment made to such fraudulent allottee shall be canceled and shall then be subject to disposition under the provisions of this act: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to deprive any such persons of the protection in the premises provided under existing law.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 5, line 12, after the word "may," strike out the words "upon request of the tribal council."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That such of the unallotted lands as are now used for agency, school, cemetery, or religious purposes shall remain reserved from allotment so long as such agency, school, cemetery, or religious institutions, respectively, are maintained for the benefit of the tribe: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior, upon the request of the tribal council, is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued a patent in fee to the duly authorized missionary board or other proper authority of any religious organization heretofore engaged in mission or school work on the reservation for such lands thereon as have been heretofore set aside and are now occupied by such organizations for missionary or school purposes: Provided further, That not more than 640 acres may be reserved for administrative purposes at the Crow Agency, and such land shall be definitely described and made a matter of record by the Indian Office.

Also, the following committee amendment was read:

On page 6, line 12, after the word "Agency," strike out the words "and such land" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "And six tracts of not exceeding 80 acres each, in different districts on the reservation, may be reserved for recreation grounds for the common use of the tribe, or purchased from the tribal funds if no tribal lands are available, and all such lands."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, in reference to this committee amendment, is it the intention that there shall be six tracts in different districts or one tract in six different districts?

Mr. RIDDICK. I will explain to the gentleman from Massachusetts that there are six big tribes and each has 80 acres in extent for recreation ground and park purposes.

Mr. WALSH. Would not this language permit six tracts of 80 acres each in each district?

Mr. RIDDICK. It provides for a tract of not exceeding 80 acres in each district. Each district will have a tract. That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I think the language of the bill will permit a district to have six tracts.

Mr. RIDDICK. The Indian Committee and the Indian Department worked this out, Mr. Chairman, and it was the purpose to have one tract in each district.

Mr. WALSH. One tract not exceeding 80 acres in each of six different districts. That is the intention, I take it.

Mr. RIDDICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WALSH. Well, that is the intention, but I think the language will permit a different construction.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 6. That any and all minerals, including oil and gas, on any of the lands to be allotted hereunder are reserved for the benefit of the members of the tribe in common and may be leased for mineral purposes, upon the request of the tribal council under such rules, regulations, and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, but no lease shall be made for a longer period than 10 years, but the lessees shall have the right to renewal thereof for a further period of 10 years upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe: Provided, however, That allotments hereunder may be made of lands classified as valuable chiefly for coal or other minerals which may be patented as herein provided with a reservation, set forth in the patent, of the coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits for the benefit of the Crow Tribe: And provided further, That at the expiration of 50 years from the date of approval of this act the coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits upon or beneath the surface of said allotted lands shall become the property of the individual allottee or his heirs.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 6, line 21, strike out the word "mineral" and insert the word "mining."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Also the following committee amendment was read:

Page 7, line 8, strike out the word "fifty" and insert in lieu thereof the word "twenty-five."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I do not know the reasons which prompted the committee in reducing this term to 25 years, but it seems to me it would be an unwise thing to do. I would like to hear from the gentleman in charge of the measure.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, the intention, of course, of your committee was to throw around these lands proper restrictions in order to safeguard the interests of these Indians. It was the opinion of the committee, as well as of those representing the tribe, who appeared before the committee, with the advice and consent of the Indian Office, that 50 years is an unnecessarily long period of time. Therefore because of the advanced condition of these Indians, because of their intellectual attainments, and because of the progress they have made in industry and agriculture, your committee is of the opinion that it is not necessary to protect them beyond the period of 25 years, and for these reasons the period was reduced from 50 to 25 years. I concede, Mr. Chairman, that there are certain tribes that on account of their condition of progress, or, more properly speaking, lack of progress, and because of the physical condition of the property involved, where it might be necessary to throw around them such a safeguard as the gentleman has in mind. But your committee was of the opinion that 25 years is as long as is necessary to protect the rights of the Indians.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman from Missouri will permit me to remind him, I will state that also in this act of February 8, 1887, a trust patent issues in 25 years.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And there is also a provision in this bill for a competency commission, and all minors will be of age then, and it was thought by the committee that in 25 years' time everybody would be of age and declared competent.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the gentleman realizes that this is shortening the time when it goes to the individual Indian or his heirs. That reduction, it would seem to me, would bring it down within a limited time that might be considered unwise. I think that, granting all that the gentleman from Missouri has said about the improvement and advancement of these Indians, it is to be doubted if we ought to shorten the time at the expiration of which these valuable lands shall become their individual property. It seemed to me that the original draft of the bill was more proper.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit this observation?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. RHODES. I desire to call the gentleman's attention to the further fact that the appearance of this delegation of Indians from the reservation before your committee caused us to change this 50-year provision to 25 years. These Indians made us believe that they are anxiously awaiting the day when they might come into full possession of their property, and that they are prepared to care for it.

Mr. WALSH. Oh, all Indians are doing that. There is no doubt about that. Take any Indians all over the country; they are anxiously awaiting the day when they can come into possession of their property.

Mr. RHODES. Is not that a laudable ambition?

Mr. WALSH. Oh, certainly; but the gentleman probably saw the most intelligent and the most industrious and the most advanced portion of these people. Now, there may be, and probably will be, a great many of these Indians that will not be as intelligent or as industrious as those that the gentleman has recently seen, and it is quite a valuable concession to say that in view of the great improvements that have been made and the wonderful discoveries along mineral lines——

Mr. RHODES. No minerals have been discovered on this reservation.

Mr. WALSH. Well, you could have said that about some of the oil fields in Texas five years ago. At that time no oil had been discovered there, but they became very valuable overnight.

Mr. RHODES. I will remind the gentleman also that those Indians who were present spoke for those who were not present as well as for themselves.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; I have no doubt about that.

Mr. RHODES. And they said they were instructed by their tribe to state the objects they were seeking; and it is not only the desire of the Indians present that is reflected in this legislation, but we believe the amendment reflects the will of the majority of the Indians on the reservation.

Mr. WALSH. Well, of course, the gentleman appreciates that if we legislated along those lines in all Indian matters, very often in following out what they ask and seek we would not be doing what ought to be done for the Indians, because sometimes they have been known to make requests and demands for legislation that have not been in their best interests, and we are here to protect, of course, the public interest and also the interest of these wards of the Nation.

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. RIDDICK. I think the observations of the gentleman from Massachusetts would be well taken if it were not for the fact that when these patents are issued in 25 years they will be issued in trust for the Indians if the Indians are not fully competent. On page 3, line 12, there is a provision dividing the Indians into competent and incompetent Indians, and only the competent are given the right to look after their own property.

Mr. WALSH. This language is broader than that, and does not, I think, come within that requirement. It says "that at the expiration of 50 years from the date of approval of this act the coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits upon or beneath the surface of said allotted lands shall become the property of the individual allottee or his heirs." That means that at the expiration of that time whatever valuable deposits there are in that land shall belong to the individual Indians, irrespective of the issuance of any trust patents or by means of any trust patents.

Mr. RIDDICK. This land will belong to the Indians, but the incompetent Indians will be subject to the Indian Department, just as they are now.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. Would it help the situation if it were provided that "said period of time may be extended by Congress"?

Mr. WALSH. Congress could do that without the right being reserved. I am opposed to this committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I desire to raise the question of the advisability of this last proviso being in the bill at all. It seems to me that the benefits arising from any coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits should for all time go to the tribe and not to the individual Indian. I want to offer a motion to strike out——

Mr. WALSH. There is an amendment pending to perfect the text.

Mr. FRENCH. I will withhold my motion until the text is perfected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. WALSH) there were—ayes 9, noes 5.

Accordingly the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on page 7, line 7, all the language following the word "tribe" and all of lines 8, 9, 10, and 11.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Idaho offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FRENCH: Page 7, line 7, after the word "tribe," strike out the remainder of the paragraph.

Mr. FRENCH. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me very inadvisable that we permit language to remain in the bill under which the coal, oil, gas, or other mineral deposits could go to the particular allottee at the expiration of 25 years. Any valuable deposits which are now there undiscovered belong to the entire tribe. It is understood that there are no such deposits known at this time. Consequently it is a mere matter of luck or chance what particular Indian shall be the one favored by being allotted land that may have underneath it vast deposits of oil or gas or coal, and under the language of the bill it would be very possible, if there should be such deposits, to make certain Indians millionaires overnight, while the value of the allotments to other Indians would remain merely such as would apply to the allotments through their agricultural character. It seems to me that the advisable thing to do is to allot the land for the Indians, so that they may see what they are getting for agricultural purposes, and then as to these possible deposits, of which no one can know anything at the time the allotment is made, that they be held forever as the property of the tribe instead of the individual Indian.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. FRENCH].

The question being taken, the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That any allotment, or part of allotment, provided for under this act, irrigable from any irrigation system now existing or hereafter constructed by the Government on the said reservation, shall bear its pro rata share, computed on a per acre basis, of the cost of constructing such system: Provided, That no additional irrigation system shall be established or constructed on the Crow Reservation until the consent of the tribal council thereto has been duly obtained. All charges against allotments authorized by this section may be reimbursed in not less than 20 annual payments, and the Secretary of the Interior may fix such operation and maintenance charges against such allotments as may be reasonable and just, to be paid as provided in rules and regulations to be prescribed by him. Unless otherwise paid, these latter charges may be paid from or made a charge upon his individual share of the tribal fund, when said fund is available for distribution; and if any allottee shall receive patent in fee to his allotment before the amount so charged against his land has been paid, such unpaid amount shall become and be a lien upon his allotment, of which a record shall be kept in the office of the superintendent of the reservation at the agency; and should any Indian sell any part of his allotment, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, the amount of such unpaid charges against the land so sold shall remain a first lien thereon, and may be enforced by the Secretary of the Interior by foreclosure as a mortgage. All expenditures for irrigation work on the Crow Reservation, Mont., heretofore or hereafter made, are hereby declared to be reimbursable under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and shall constitute a lien against the land benefited, regardless of ownership, and including all lands which have heretofore been sold or patented. All patents or other instruments of conveyance hereafter issued for lands under any irrigation project on the said Crow Indian Reservation, whether to individual Indians or to purchasers of Indian lands, shall recite a lien for repayment of the irrigation charges, if any, remaining unpaid at the time of issuance of such patent or other instrument of conveyance, and such lien may be enforced or, upon payment of the delinquent charges, may be released by the Secretary of the Interior. In the case of lands under any project purchased in the bona fide belief on the part of the purchaser that by his purchase he acquired a right to have water from the system for the irrigation of the land purchased by him in the same manner as the Indian owner, the Secretary may, after notice to the Indians interested, determine the value of the land at the time of the purchase from the Indian, and give to the purchaser or his assigns credit on the charge for construction against the land to the amount of the difference between the price paid and the value as so determined, and shall withhold for the benefit of the tribe from the Indian or Indians of whom the purchase was made, an equal amount from any funds which may be due or distributable to them hereunder. Delivery of water to such land may be refused, within the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, until all dues are paid: Provided, That no right to water or to the use of any irrigation ditch or other structure on said reservation shall vest until the owner of the land to be irrigated shall comply with such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, and he is hereby authorized to prescribe such rules and regulations as may be deemed reasonable and proper for making effective the foregoing provisions: Provided, however, That in no case shall any allottee be required to pay either construction, operation, or maintenance charges for such irrigation privileges, or any of them, until water has been actually delivered to his allotment: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be made immediately, if not already made, an itemized statement showing in detail the cost of the construction of the several irrigation systems now existing on the Crow Indian Reservation separately, the same to be placed at the Crow Agency, and with the Government farmers of each of the districts of the reservation, for the information of the Indians affected by section 7 of this act.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 7, line 24, after the word "constructed," insert "by the Government for the irrigation of Indian lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 8, line 3, after the word "section," strike out the word "may" and insert the word "shall."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 8, line 3, after the word "reimburse," insert "to the Crow Tribe of Indians."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 8, line 23, after the word "reimbursable," insert "to the Crow Tribe."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 10, line 20, after the word "by," insert the word "this."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 10, line 20, after the word "section," insert "7 of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That any unallotted lands on the Crow Reservation chiefly valuable for the development of water power shall be reserved from allotment or other disposition hereunder, for the benefit of the Crow Tribe of Indians: Provided, That such lands shall not be leased or otherwise disposed of without the consent of the tribal council.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 11, line 4, after the word "Indians," strike out "Provided, That such lands shall not be leased or otherwise disposed of without the consent of the tribal council" and insert "Provided, That the Big Horn and Pryor Mountains shall be reserved from allotment."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That so much of article 2 of the act of April 27, 1904, entitled "An act to ratify and amend an agreement with the Indians of the Crow Reservation in Montana, and making appropriations to carry the same into effect" (33 Stat., p. 353), as relates to the disposition of the trust funds of the tribe at the expiration of the 15-year period named in the act, to the purchase of cattle, to the distribution of cattle among the Indians of the reservation, to the purchase of jackasses, stallions, and ewes, to the building of fences, the erection of schoolhouses and hospitals, the purchase of additional cattle or sheep, the construction of ditches, dams, and canals, and to the establishment of a trust fund for the benefit of the Crow Indians thereunder, be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, That all remaining trust funds arising under the terms of said agreement, or otherwise, with such interest thereon as may now be due, shall be set aside and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until the same are distributed as provided by law: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to permit competent Indians who have received patents in fee and other Indians who have demonstrated their ability to properly care for live stock to withdraw their pro rata share of cattle out of the tribal herd within one year after the approval of this act, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe and on condition that said Indians shall execute a stipulation relinquishing all their right, title, and interest in said tribal herd thereafter: Provided further, That any Indian who has received his share of stock in accordance with the above provision and who has also demonstrated his ability to properly care for and handle live stock may also be permitted to withdraw the pro rata shares of his wife and minor children under the same rules and regulations as applied to the stock already issued to him and on condition that such cattle be branded with the individual brands of his wife and minor children, which shall be recorded in the names of the respective members of his family. It shall be the duty of the superintendent of the Crow Reservation to observe closely the manner in which such stock are handled and cared for, and in case of failure or neglect to properly care for the same the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to take charge of such shares and sell them for the benefit of the individual owners, to whose credit the proceeds of the sale shall be placed, or return them to the tribal herd or handle them with tribal cattle for the minor or incompetent owners and charge a fee to cover the cost of caring for them.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 11, line 22, after the word "repealed," strike out the following language: "Provided, That all remaining trust funds arising under the terms of said agreement, or otherwise, with such interest thereon as may now be due, shall be set aside and draw interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum until the same are distributed as provided by law" and insert the following: "effective from and after June 30, 1920: Provided, That all unexpended balances of trust funds arising under said agreement shall thereupon be consolidated into one fund to the credit of the tribe, the same to bear interest at the rate of 4 per cent per annum: Provided further, That there shall be reserved and set aside from such consolidated fund, or any other funds to the credit of the tribe, a sufficient sum to pay the administrative expenses of the agency for a period of five years; $100,000 for the support of the agency boarding school; $50,000 for the support of the agency hospital, and not to exceed $4,000 of this amount shall be expended in any one year for the support of said hospital; and $50,000 for a revolving fund to be used for the purchase of seed, animals, machinery, tools, implements, and other equipment for sale to individual members of the tribe, under conditions to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior for its repayment to the tribe on or before June 30, 1925: Provided further, That the expenditure of the sums so reserved are hereby specifically authorized, except those for administrative expenses of the agency, which shall be subject to annual appropriations by Congress: Provided further, That after said sums have been reserved and set aside, together with a sufficient amount to pay all other expenses authorized by this act, the balance of such consolidated fund, and all other funds to the credit of the tribe or placed to its credit thereafter, shall be distributed per capita to the Indians entitled:"

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 14, line 5, after the word "for," strike out the word "them" and insert the words "such live stock."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That upon the approval of this act the Secretary of the Interior shall forthwith appoint a commission consisting of three persons to complete the enrollment of the members of the tribes as herein provided for and to divide them into two classes, competents and incompetents, said commission to be constituted as follows: Two of said commissioners shall be enrolled members of the Crow Indian Tribe and shall be selected by a majority vote of three delegates from each of the districts on the Crow Reservation; and one commissioner shall be a representative of the Department of the Interior, to be selected by the Secretary of the Interior. Said commission shall be governed by regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the classification of the members of the tribe hereunder shall be subject to his approval. That within 30 days after their appointment said commissioners shall meet at some point within the Crow Indian Reservation and organize by the election of one of their number as chairman. That said commissioners shall then proceed personally to classify the members as above indicated. They shall be paid a salary of not to exceed $10 per day each and necessary expenses while actually employed in the work of making this classification, exclusive of subsistence, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, such classification to be completed within six months from the date of organizing the commission.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on this section by printing a letter written by me to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs touching this matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Oklahoma?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 17. That the Secretary of the Interior (with the approval of the Crow Tribal Council) is authorized to set aside for administrative purposes (at the Crow Agency and at Pryor subagency) such tracts for town-site purposes as in his opinion may be required for the public interests, not to exceed 80 acres at each town site, and he may cause the same to be surveyed into lots and blocks and disposed of under such regulations as he may prescribe; and he is authorized also to set apart and reserve for school, park, and other public purposes not more than 10 acres in said town sites; and patents shall be issued for the lands so set apart and reserved for school, park, and other purposes to the municipality or school district legally charged with the care and custody of lands donated for such purposes. The purchase price of all town lots sold in town sites shall be paid at such time and in such installments as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 18, after the word "purposes," insert: "Provided, however, That the present park at Crow Agency shall not be included in such town sites or be subject to such disposition."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 18, line 11, strike out the words "and in such installments."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 18, line 12, after the word "direct," insert the words "and placed to the credit of the Crow Tribe of Indians."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 18. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, of the tribal funds of the Crow Indians of the State of Montana is hereby appropriated to pay the expenses of the general council, or councils, or business committee, in looking after the affairs of said tribe, including the actual and necessary expenses and the per diems paid its legislative committee when visiting Washington on tribal business at the request of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs or a committee of Congress, said sum and the actual and necessary expenses to be approved by and certified by the Secretary of the Interior, and when so approved and certified to be paid.

The following committee amendment was read:

Page 18, line 19, after the word "expenses," strike out the words "and the per diems."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Page 19, line 1, after the word "paid," insert: "Provided, That not to exceed $2,500 shall be expended in any one fiscal year."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that. What is this proviso based on that we are going to appropriate $10,000 each year for the visiting delegation to come to Washington?

Mr. RHODES. I think only so much of the $10,000 as may be necessary. I will state that under existing law and under the practice the Department of the Interior makes an allowance every year of a reasonable sum to these Indians coming here annually on departmental business.

Mr. WALSH. That is carried in the Indian appropriation bill. Why do we add another $10,000 for this particular tribe? It will last them about four years.

Mr. RHODES. That provision in the bill was very energetically urged by the delegation of Indians who appeared here.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, they like to come to Washington at the Government expense. However, Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my reservation of a point of order.

Mr. RIDDICK. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RIDDICK: Page 19, after line 2, insert as a new section:

"SEC. 19. That the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated out of the funds of the Crow Tribe of Indians to pay costs, expenses, and fees in suits that may be brought to recover the use and possession of any allotment, to which the allottee has been unlawfully dispossessed or denied the control of, and the United States District Court of Montana is hereby given jurisdiction to hear, try, and determine any such case with right of appeal as in other cases provided by law. The United States may be made a party to any such suit in the discretion of the court. An attorney or attorneys may be employed by the Crow Tribe of Indians, and the contract, fees, and expenses shall be approved by the said district court and as so approved shall be paid out of said appropriation."

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman withhold that for a moment?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is offered at the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY]. While I am not going to argue the point of order, yet in deference to him the amendment has been submitted for such action as the committee may see fit to take.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is clearly subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. CRAGO, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of lands of the Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. RHODES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en grosse. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 28, noes 0.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. RHODES, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD upon the print-paper situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted, as follows:

To Mr. ALMON, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. BLAND of Indiana (at the request of Mr. PURNELL), for 10 days, on account of illness.

ANNIVERSARY OF LANDING OF PILGRIMS.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, it may be in order to consider House joint resolution 302, which makes provision for Federal participation in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims. This resolution came up the other day on the call of the Calendar for Unanimous Consent. Objection was made to it, but the gentleman who objected has assured me that he has no further objection to the resolution. I have conferred with the majority leader, Mr. MONDELL, and the distinguished leader of the minority, Mr. CLARK. They assure me there is no objection to the matter being considered to-morrow. I do not think it will take any great length of time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that after the consideration of the resolution just referred to the House may take up for consideration bills on the Private Calendar not objected to.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire of the gentleman if to-morrow is not the regular day for the consideration of private bills.

Mr. MONDELL. It is; but I am making my request in order that gentlemen may understand that only bills not objected to will be considered.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There is one man, to my certain knowledge, who has been waiting for six weeks in order to object to one bill that is on that calendar. I have no objection to the request.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that to-morrow bills on the Private Calendar not objected to may be taken up for consideration. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, my colleague, Mr. LANHAM, has a bill on that calendar that has the right to be called up under the regular Private Calendar day. He has been waiting for some time to have that bill called up.

Mr. MONDELL. Has it been objected to?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; it was objected to. It is a case of a young girl who was thrown into a wire fence and injured very badly. He feels that, in view of the fact that other such cases have been passed on, his case ought to take its regular turn. He is not here right now.

Mr. MONDELL. My request is made for this reason: There are near the head of the calendar bills to which there is a very great deal of objection. I am afraid that if at this time we take up the bills in their regular order we will spend the entire day and accomplish nothing, and we would not reach the bill to which the gentleman has referred.

Mr. BLANTON. I was just trying to protect the interest of the gentleman from Texas in the matter.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Does the gentleman know who objected?

Mr. BLANTON. He is standing pretty close to the gentleman now.

Mr. WALSH. I did.

Mr. MONDELL. Just a little later I hope we will be able to take up the Private Calendar and pass upon the bills as we reach them.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, if this agreement is made, there will be no bills taken up to-morrow to which objection is lodged?

Mr. MONDELL. There will not.

Mr. BLANTON. Will there be another day on which bills will come up in their regular order during this session?

Mr. MONDELL. That is my purpose and expectation.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We will be here all summer, and there will be plenty of time.

Mr. MONDELL. I hope the gentleman from Missouri is not a prophet. I hope we will not be here after the 5th day of June.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wyoming? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 14 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Friday, April 23, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report in connection with House bill 13500, to amend an act to provide a government for the Territory of Hawaii and to establish an Hawaiian homes commission, and for other purposes, was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on the Territories.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. VOLSTEAD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 521) directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate whether any corporation is violating the antitrust laws touching sugar, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 861), which said resolution and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. CALDWELL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 336) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Albert Sidney Johnston Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 1820, Fort Worth, Tex., 100 cots and blankets for the use of Confederate veterans at the reunion of said camp, June 24 to 27, inclusive, 1920, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 862), which said resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SINNOTT, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10285) to authorize the purchase by the city of Myrtle Point, Oreg., of certain lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co. and revested in the United States by the act approved June 9, 1916, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 863), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13389) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to dispose of at public auction certain isolated and fractional tracts of lands formerly embraced in the grant to the Oregon & California Railroad Co., reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 864), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 2792) to enlarge the boundaries of the Oregon National Forest, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 865), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. IRELAND, from the Committee on Accounts, to which was referred the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 320) providing for pay to clerks to Members of Congress and Delegates, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 866), which said joint resolution and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Invalid Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13621) granting a pension to Hiram L. Middlebrooks, and the same was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HICKS: A bill (H. R. 13742) to amend sections 3 and 6 of the act of July 11, 1916, entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," as amended by sections 5 and 6 of the act of February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Roads.

By Mr. SMITH of New York: A bill (H. R. 13743) to amend the bankruptcy act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, April 23, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts to Thee at the beginning of this new day of work, and pray that we may have the joy that comes to us in contemplation of the fact that we are working to accomplish a divine plan. May we enjoy the rich inheritance, the realization of the dreams of our fathers in human government and society, and not only follow the personal pursuit of ideals but work out under the divine guidance a plan that shall last forever. Oh, grant us this joy this day, and companionship with the great Architect of government and life. We ask for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when on request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the following enrolled bills, which had previously been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

S. 806. An act conferring jurisdiction on the Court of Claims to hear, determine, and render judgment in claims of the Iowa Tribe of Indians against the United States; and

S. 2442. An act authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to convey to the trustees of the Yankton Agency Presbyterian Church, by patent in fee, certain land within the Yankton Indian Reservation.

INTERNATIONAL HIGH COMMISSION.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (S. 3828) to amend the act approved February 7, 1916, entitled "An act providing for the maintenance of the United States section of the International High Commission," to report the same back to the Senate and ask to be discharged from its further consideration, with the suggestion that it be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that action will be taken.

CLAIM OF JAMES K. HACKETT.

Mr. MOSES, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 1519) making appropriations for expenses incurred under the treaty of Washington, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 545) thereon.

NATIONAL PROHIBITION.

Mr. MOSES. From the Committee on Printing I report an original resolution, and I ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the resolution.

The Assistant Secretary read the resolution (S. Res. 352), as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript entitled, "Appellees' and Appellant's Briefs," in an appeal from the United States district court for the district of New Jersey, in the Supreme Court of the United States, on the validity of the so-called eighteenth amendment; and the briefs in the appeal from the Kentucky, Rhode Island, and Wisconsin district courts to the Supreme Court of the United States, relative to the enforcement of the prohibition amendment, be printed in one volume as a Senate document.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears none. The question is on agreeing to the resolution. [Putting the question.] The resolution is not agreed to.

Mr. MOSES. Mr. President, the resolution provides for the printing of certain documents for which there is a great demand, and I ask for a division on the question.

On a division, the resolution was rejected.

Mr. BRANDEGEE subsequently said: Mr. President, a day or two ago I had referred to the Committee on Printing a request that the brief in the suit pending in the Supreme Court of the United States, known as No. 788, which is the appellant's brief on the validity of the so-called eighteenth amendment, might be printed. I did this because that suit, in my judgment, involved more as to our form of government and the rights of the States, as distinguished from the rights of the central Government, than any suit that has ever been tried in the Supreme Court, at least since the great questions of the Civil War. The Committee on Printing made a report recommending that that brief and the brief of the Government in that suit be printed as a public document, and also that the brief suggested by the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD], the Government brief in that case, be printed; and the Senate rejected the committee's report. I have been assured by several Senators, when I told them that I was about to make this brief a part of my remarks, which probably would extend over quite a period of time, that they did not understand what the report of the committee was; and if they had understood it, they would have made no objection to the printing, but of course that mere statement to me does not change the action of the Senate, and so, with the consent of the Senate, I will read the brief.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SPENCER. May I ask the Senator whether the printed brief carries out the remarks that he has intended to make upon the subject?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Why, yes. I intended to read the brief, Mr. President.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask unanimous consent that permission be granted to print the brief without reading.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I have no objection, providing the briefs of counsel representing the other side can be published also.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I think it is only fair that both sides of the case should appear in the RECORD; and while I dislike to have the Senator make consent to the printing of my brief contingent upon the printing of his, I certainly shall not object to his request. I think that the people of the country are entitled to the arguments of both sides, which are stated in the briefs much more understandably and at greater length than they were in the arguments of the counsel, necessarily. The arguments of counsel are not printed at all, and they embraced a very short period of time; but, in my opinion, the brief in this suit will be a lesson to the whole people of this country upon the great rival claims as to constitutional law presented by this case.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, each brief will be printed.

The briefs are as follows:

"SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"October Term, 1919, No. 788.

[Christian Feigenspan, a corporation, plaintiff-appellant, v. Joseph L. Bodine, United States attorney, and Charles V. Duffy, collector of internal revenue, defendants-appellees. Appeal from the United States district court for the district of New Jersey.]

"APPELLANT'S BRIEF ON THE VALIDITY OF THE SO-CALLED EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT.

"The appeal in the case at bar presents for review a final decree of the United States district court for the district of New Jersey dismissing the plaintiff's bill of complaint and denying its motion for a preliminary injunction.

"It is deemed unnecessary to repeat the statement of facts here. In the following brief the validity of the so-called eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is discussed and the justiciability of the contentions upon that score are considered. In the appellant's separate brief on the construction of the eighteenth amendment and the constitutionality of title 2 of the national prohibition act will be found a full statement of the facts appearing from the bill of complaint and the supporting affidavits.

"The so-called eighteenth amendment reads as follows:

"'SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, and the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"'SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.'

"The plaintiff contends that this attempted amendment to the Constitution of the United States is invalid (1) because it constitutes mere legislation, and is, therefore, not authorized by Article V of the Constitution; (2) because it impairs the reserved police or governmental powers of the several States and their right to local self-government; and (3) because it has not been ratified by three-fourths of the several States, since it has not been submitted to the electorate of the States in which the initiative or the referendum, or both, prevail (assignment of errors Nos. 1–5.) These questions are discussed in points II, III, and IV, respectively. In point I the prior amendments to the Constitution are considered with references to these contentions, and in point V the justiciability of the contentions is maintained.

"THE PRIOR AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION CONSIDERED.

"An analysis of the prior amendments to the Federal Constitution will show that none of them directly invaded the police powers of the several States or impaired their right to local self-government. The first 10 amendments 'left the authority of the States just where they found it, and added nothing to the already existing powers of the United States.' (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 542, 552; Spies v. Illinois, 123 U. S., 131, 166; Barron v. City of Baltimore, 7 Pet., 243, 250; Minn. & St. Louis R. R. v. Bombolis, 241 U. S., 211, 217.) They were but express declarations of the intent and effect of the unamended Constitution, and were adopted in order permanently to reassure the people of the States that no encroachments by the Federal Government upon their fundamental rights were being contemplated or authorized. (The preamble to the resolution proposing the first 10 amendments recited (1 Stat., 97) that 'the conventions of a number of the States having at the time of their adopting the Constitution expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added: And as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government will best insure the beneficent ends of its institution,' it was accordingly resolved to submit the amendments.) The eleventh amendment merely further restricted the judicial power of the United States; if anything, it added rather than subtracted from the powers of the several States. The twelfth amendment readjusted the procedure of the electoral college; it had no effect upon the States. The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments are discussed below. The sixteenth amendment merely changed the method by which income taxes might be levied by the Federal Government, but it diminished or affected none of the powers of the States. The seventeenth amendment altered the manner in which United States Senators were thereafter to be chosen, but it did not detract in the slightest from the police powers or the sovereignty of the States.

"Nor did the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments impair the right of local self-government, when read in the light of their history and primary purpose and correctly understood, as has been frequently held by this court. (Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall., 36, 68, et seq.; Barbier v. Connolly, 113 U. S., 27, 31; Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall., 129, 138; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S., 3, 11; Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S., 623, 663; In re Kemmler, 136 U. S., 436, 448, 449; In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545, 556; Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S., 347, 362.) In Barbier v. Connolly, supra, the court said that—

"'Neither the [fourteenth] amendment—broad and comprehensive as it is—nor any other amendment, was designed to interfere with the power of the State, sometimes termed its police power, to prescribe regulations, to promote the health, peace, morals, education, and good order of the people, and to legislate so as to increase the industries of the State, develop its resources, and add to its wealth and prosperity.'

"These three amendments grew out of the War of the Rebellion. The outbreak of that struggle, of course, laid the Federal Government under the duty of exercising its war powers to the utmost so as to suppress the insurrection. In the prosecution of that purpose Federal troops occupied some ,and eventually all, of the rebel territory, and, in the natural conduct of the war, seized all such enemy property as could be used against them. Included among this property were slaves, and as it directly tended to weaken the enemy to set free their slaves, the Federal forces did so. Finally, the President proclaimed their freedom. In so far as that proclamation related to the past, it merely declared an accomplished fact; and in so far as it related to the future, it constituted an order of the commander in chief to his military subordinates to be carried out in all the rebel territory within their power. The institution of slavery thus perished as a consequence of the exercise of the Federal war power. (Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall., 36, 38; Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700, 728.) This 'war power is not limited to victories in the field and the dispersion of the insurgent forces; it carries with it inherently the power to guard against the immediate renewal of the conflict, and to remedy the evils which have arisen from its rise and progress.' (Stewart v. Kahn, 11 Wall., 493, 507.) To effectuate the Federal war power, to perpetuate its necessary consequences, to prevent the recurrence of any such rebellion, and to remove the very cause thereof, the thirteenth amendment was adopted. It will be observed that its primary purpose and effect were wholly Federal.

"In this manner the compromise effected in the original Constitution, which had attempted to reconcile slavery with the republican form of government and to experiment with bondage in a land dedicated to freedom, finally failed, and it disappeared in the struggle of the Civil War. As a consequence, therefore, of the arbitrament of war, which all must accept, however revolutionary in character, it was settled politically in this country that slavery was inconsistent with any due form of republican government. When, therefore, Congress and the Executive undertook the reconstruction of the seceded States, they required them to set up a truly republican form of government, namely, one in which all men would thereafter be free.

"The termination of the actual struggle of the Civil War left the Federal Government with a constitutional duty to perform in the rebel territory, namely, the duty to restore and guarantee a republican form of government in those States, as required by section 4 of Article IV of the Constitution. (Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700, 727, et seq.) But, as had long been contended and was then fully realized, no government could in fact be free or in truth republican in which the inalienable rights of man were not respected, in which all men might not live, be free, and hold their own without arbitrary interference by the Government and upon a footing of substantial equality. (Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655, 662; Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall., 386, 388; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet., 627, 647, 657.) Equality and justice to all freemen in the rebel States had, therefore, to be established and secured (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 542, 555), and, to that end, an unambiguous determination had to be made of the status of former slaves, which cases like the Dred Scott case (19 How., 393) had left in confusion. It was for the accomplishment primarily of these Federal ends that the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments were made part of our fundamental law. (Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall., 36, 70–1, 72–3.) (Senator Howard, who introduced the fourteenth amendment on behalf of the Reconstruction Committee, said (Cong. Globe, 39th Congress, 1st sess., pt. 3, p. 2766): 'Without this principle of equal justice to all men and equal protection under the shield of the law, there is no republican government and none that is really worth maintaining.' And Senator Poland said of the equal-protection clause of the fourteenth amendment (id., pt. 4, p. 2961): 'It is the very spirit and inspiration of our system of government, the absolute foundation upon which it was established. It is essentially declared in the Declaration of Independence and in all the provisions of the Constitution. * * * It certainly seems desirable that no doubt should be left existing as to the power of Congress to enforce principles lying at the very foundation of all republican government if they be denied or violated by the States, and I can not doubt but that every Senator will rejoice in aiding to remove all doubt upon this power of Congress.' Rhode Island in ratifying the Constitution declared (Elliot's Debates, p. 334): 'That there are certain natural rights of which men when they form a social contract can not deprive or divest their posterity, among which are the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.' In order, therefore, to assure a really republican form of government in every State, it became necessary to establish the essentials of republicanism in each State as an effective Federal right, so that they might be at all times available to the individual in judicial tribunals that were always open and could act promptly for his protection and with a due regard to the practical necessities of the particular case.

"The thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments, consequently, were intended to be corrective, and they added no new restriction upon the essential powers of the several States, to which their membership in a free republican government had not theretofore already subjected them. They merely made express and effective what was formerly implied in the guaranty of a republican form of government, and provided adequate machinery for the enforcement of those implied obligations. As Chief Justice Waite declared in United States v. Cruikshank (92 U. S., 542, 554):

"'The fourteenth amendment prohibits a State from denying to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; but this provision does not, any more than the one which preceedes it, * * * add anything to the rights which one citizen has under the Constitution against another. The equality of the rights of citizens is a principle of republicanism. Every republican government is in duty bound to protect all its citizens in the enjoyment of this principle, if within its power.

That duty was originally assumed by the States; and it still remains there. The only obligation resting upon the United States is to see that the States do not deny the right. This the amendment guarantees, but no more. The power of the National Government is limited to the enforcement of this guaranty.'

"These amendments were, consequently, germane to the express guaranty of a republican form of government, and the effectuation of that guaranty was their primary purpose and direct effect. They were never intended to disturb the fundamental relation between the States and the Federal Government, nor in the smallest degree 'to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character,' nor to make any 'departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions' (Slaughter House cases, 16 Wall., 36, 67, 78). As emphatically declared in the authority last cited:

"'We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.'

"The conclusion to be deduced from the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments is that constitutional amendments may be made which are chiefly and primarily intended to effectuate or fortify the guaranty to the States of a republican form of government or some other function already vested in the Federal Government, even if their incidental or secondary effect may be to restrict the liberty of the States and their power in a minor degree. But such amendments furnish no warrant for an amendment like the one now before the court, which directly and substantially invades the essential powers of the several States and is entirely unrelated to any original or fundamentally Federal purpose.

"B.

"The prior amendments were also not open to the objection that they were merely legislation directly affecting the conduct of life of the individual, as is the so-called eighteenth amendment. The thirteenth amendment, despite its superficial resemblance, is not in reality mere legislation. The right of one to hold another in bondage is not, under our system of law, a natural or inherent right. (Indeed, it was judicially held in Massachusetts in 1781 that slavery was contrary to the Massachusetts declaration of rights. Mass. Law Quarterly, Vol. II, pp. 437–444; Somerset v. Stewart, 20 State Trials, 1, 82 (1772).) Wherever, therefore, the institution of slavery had a foothold in this country it was by virtue of State laws permitting it to exist. Consequently the thirteenth amendment, although in form a prohibition of slavery, in legal effect amounted to a limitation upon the power of all governments within the United States to legalize and authorize slavery. In other words, it was equivalent to an amendment reading as follows:

"'Neither the United States nor any of the several States shall hereafter have power to make lawful slavery or involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted.'

"It is, therefore, apparent that this amendment primarily limits governmental power and is operative upon governments, and only incidentally, if at all, upon individuals. It is not a false-imprisonment statute.

"The so-called eighteenth amendment is, however, quite different in its nature. It deals with a subject matter that does not draw its right to exist from positive law. If there be no positive law within a State one way or the other, anyone may engage in trafficking liquor therein. Therefore, a direct prohibition upon the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor is primarily not a limitation upon the powers of government, but upon the rights and conduct of life of the individual. That is to say, it is mere legislation, and not that adjustment and apportionment of governmental powers with which alone a constitution is properly concerned.

"In this respect a constitutional amendment granting to the Government power to prohibit intoxicants would be quite different from an attempted amendment itself directly declaring the prohibition of intoxicants. The former would merely add to the powers of government and would, therefore, in this regard at least, be a proper form of constitutional amendment; while the latter in its essence neither would add nor withdraw powers of government, but would be direct legislation. The eighteenth amendment is, therefore, in substance and effect a statute, not a constitutional provision akin to any in the Federal Constitution.

"The distinction to which the foregoing is addressed is no mere formalism. It concerns itself with the vitals of free government. The existence of a power of government beyond the reach of the majority to alter does not carry with it any threat of oppression of the majority, because they can at all times control the exercise of that power. If the majority now existing had desired that the power to prohibit intoxicants, for example, should be exercised by Congress and had so worded the amendment, they could have accomplished their will from time to time by calling on their representatives in Congress to act accordingly. If thereafter the majority then existing no longer believed the exercise of the power necessary, they would have had it within their power to regulate and could have procured their congressional representatives to recall what had theretofore been done. But the rule of the majority can not be preserved, if the legislators of to-day can, under the guise or color of amending the Federal Constitution, enact ordinary legislation into the Constitution. If they can provide, not that Congress shall hereafter have power to prohibit intoxicants, but directly that intoxicants are hereby prohibited, then the policy of the Government, in its immediate relation to and effect upon the life of the individual, permanently passes out of the control of all subsequent majorities and permanently leaves the conduct of the life of all absolutely in the hands of the minority, for the rule of individual conduct thus written into the Constitution can not be withdrawn therefrom so long as more than one-third of both Houses of Congress or more than one-fourth of the legislatures of the States refuse their assent.

"Again, provisions affecting slavery and freedom are in their intrinsic nature of the essence of the framework or composition of government. A constitution is not a proper framework of government if it does not make clear, expressly or by implication, who are included within the governing class of the country and what their rights and obligations are. The unamended Constitution gave the powers of government to the freemen, but provided that these should be represented in the Congress, not merely in proportion to their own numbers, but in proportion as well to the number of their slaves (Art. I, sec. 2; see also sec. 9, and Art. IV, sec. 2). The thirteenth amendment, which prevented the Government of any State or of the United States from reestablishing the slavery which the Emancipation Proclamation of January, 1863, had destroyed, therefore operated not only on governments alone, as we have seen, but operated upon them in respect of the essential basis of free government in determining who constituted the free people from whom the Government derived its powers and who were the basis of taxation and representation. This provision, with the fourteenth and fifteenth amendments, dealt therefore with one of the most important subjects of the original Constitution. Together they settled the compromises which appeared in the second section of Article I regarding the apportionment of representatives and direct taxes, and in the provisions of the second section of Article IV regarding the conflict of laws relating to persons held to service in one State escaping into another. (Slaughter House Cases, 16 Wall., 36, 67, 68.) Consequently in this aspect also the thirteenth amendment was not a mere prohibitory law, but an essential provision affecting the composition and framework of our system of government.

"II.

"THE SO-CALLED EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT WAS NOT WITHIN THE AUTHORITY VESTED IN CONGRESS AND THE LEGISLATURES OF THREE-FOURTHS OF THE STATES BY ARTICLE V OF THE CONSTITUTION, BUT WAS THE UNAUTHORIZED ENACTMENT OF AN ORDINARY LAW UNDER COLOR OF AMENDMENT.

"Article V of the Constitution of the United States provides as follows:

"'The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article; and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.'

"The operative part of the alleged eighteenth amendment reads as follows:

"'SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"It is apparent that the prohibition contained in this so-called amendment is not what would ordinarily be considered a constitutional provision. It does not relate to the powers or the organization of government. It is itself an exercise of the power of government through an ordinary act of legislation similar to laws passed by the legislatures of many States in the exercise of their police power. It is a command purporting to be issued by sovereign authority regulating the conduct of life by private individuals.

"The power granted in the second section is limited to the enforcement of the prohibition contained in the first section and depends upon it. There is no grant unless the prohibition was a valid exercise of the amending power.

"The following argument is in support of the contention that Congress and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States have no power to enact such a law under color of an alleged constitutional amendment, and that their act is a usurpation of authority. Such contention may be summarized as follows:

"(a) That the authority to amend the Constitution is a continuance of the constitution-making power and as such is a power quite different and altogether distinct from the law-making power under the Constitution.

"(b) That a grant of the one power does not include or imply a grant of the other.

"(c) That the natural and ordinary meaning of the words used in Article V of the Constitution limits the power granted to the function of constitution making as distinguished from ordinary law-making.

"(d) That the purposes of the grant imply the same limitation.

"(e) That other parts of the Constitution—notably Article I—express the same limitation.

"(f) That the existence of authority under Article V to enact ordinary laws regulating the conduct of private citizens under color of amendment, would be so in conflict with the fundamental principles and spirit of the Constitution that such a construction is not permissible.

"It is to be observed that this view is not in the slightest degree affected by the fact that Article V contains express exceptions to the grant of power to amend. The matters expressly excepted would clearly have come within the power granted, if not excepted.

"Our contention is not for a further exception to the power granted; it is that the grant itself does not include the power of ordinary legislation. This is no more affected by the fact that there are express exceptions to the power which was granted than would be the proposition that the grant of the fifth article does not include the judicial power or power to command the Army and Navy.

"1. The authority to pass such a prohibitory law must be sustained, if at all, as an exercise of a special power granted to Congress and the State legislatures by the terms of Article V of the Constitution. It can not be supported by any idea that the alleged amendment is in any other sense the action of the people of the United States. It has never been submitted to the people of the United States, and they have never acted or had an opportunity to act upon it.

"The Constitutional Convention of 1787 understood very well the difference between referring a question to the people and referring the same question to the State legislatures for their action. The Articles of Confederation had provided that no alteration should be made in them 'unless such alteration be agreed to in a Congress of the United States and be afterwards confirmed by the legislatures of every State.' Yet, by the resolutions of the convention adopted on the 13th of September, it was resolved 'that the preceding Constitution be laid before the United States in Congress assembled, and that it is the opinion of this convention that it should afterwards be submitted to a convention of delegates chosen in each State by the people thereof under the recommendation of its legislature for their assent and ratification.' (Journal, p. 370.) And Article VII of the Constitution then provided that 'the ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.'

"This was a clear departure from the terms of the Articles of Confederation governing the Union which the convention was attempting to make more perfect. It was revolutionary in character and it was the result of long consideration and debate.

"The Virginia plan, which was proposed by Mr. Randolph on the 29th of May, 1787, and which formed the basis of consideration by the convention, contained the following clause (Journal, p. 70):

"'Resolved, That the amendments which shall be offered to the confederation by the convention ought, at a proper time or times after the approbation of Congress, to be submitted to an assembly or assemblies of representatives recommended by the several legislatures to be expressly chosen by the people to consider and decide thereon.'

"On the 23d of July, this resolution having been agreed to in Committee of the Whole and being under consideration, Mr. Ellsworth moved to substitute a reference to the legislatures of the States for ratification. Upon that motion debate ensued. Apart from the considerations of convenience and the relative probabilities in favor of action in one way or the other, the substantial ground upon which the action finally taken was based, was that a reference to conventions expressly chosen by the people for the purpose of passing upon the Constitution was a reference to the people, and that a reference to the legislatures was not a reference to the people. Madison's notes tell us that (3 Documentary History of United States Constitution, pp. 405, 409, 410):

"'Col. Mason considered a reference of the plan to the authority of the people as one of the most important and essential of the resolutions. The legislatures had no power to ratify. They are the mere creatures of the State constitutions, and can not be greater than their creators, and he knew of no power in any of the constitutions; there was no power in some of them that could be competent to this object. Whither then must we resort? To the people with whom all power remains that has not been given up in the constitutions derived from them. It was of great moment, he observed, that this doctrine should be cherished as the basis of free government.'

"Mr. Gouverneur Morris said:

"'If the confederation is to be pursued, no alteration can be made without the unanimous consent of the legislatures. Legislative alterations not conformable to the Federal compact would clearly not be valid. The judges would consider them as null and void. Whereas in case of an appeal to the people of the United States, the supreme authority, the Federal compact may be altered by a majority of them in like manner as the constitution of a particular State may be altered by a majority of the people of the State.

"'Mr. Madison thought it clear that the legislatures were incompetent to the proposed changes. These changes would make essential inroads on the State constitutions, and it would be a novel and dangerous doctrine that a legislature could change the constitution under which it held its existence. There might indeed be some constitutions within the Union which had given the power to the legislature to concur in alterations of the Federal compact, but there were certainly some which had not; and, in case of these, a ratification must of necessity be obtained from the people. He considered the difference between a system founded on the legislatures only and one founded on the people to be the true difference between a league or treaty and a constitution. The former in point of moral obligation might be as inviolable as the latter. In point of political operation there were two important distinctions in favor of the latter: One, a law violating a treaty ratified by a preexisting law might be respected by the judges as a law, though an unwise and perfidious one; two, a law violating a constitution established by the people themselves would be considered by the judges as null and void.'

"And so the Constitution became the act of the people of the United States instead of the act of the legislatures of the several States. No decision entering into the Constitution of American Government has had more momentous consequences than this, for it is the chief corner stone upon which rests that great line of decisions of this court which have established and confirmed the Nation.

"This distinction was stated by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316, 403), in the following language:

"'The convention which framed the Constitution was, indeed, elected by the State legislatures. But the instrument, when it came from their hands, was a mere proposal, without obligation, or pretentions to it. It was reported to the then existing Congress of the United States, with a request that it might "be submitted to a convention of delegates, chosen in each State, by the people thereof, under the recommendation of its legislature, for their assent and ratification." This mode of proceeding was adopted; and by the convention, by Congress, and by the State legislatures the instrument was submitted to the people. They acted upon it, in the only manner in which they can act safely, effectively, and wisely, on such a subject, by assembling in convention. It is true, they assembled in their several States; and where else should they have assembled? No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States and of compounding the American people into one common mass. Of consequence, when they act, they act in their States. But the measures they adopt do not on that account cease to be the measures of the people themselves or become the measures of the State governments.

"'From these conventions the Constitution derives its whole authority. The Government proceeds directly from the people; is "ordained and established" in the name of the people; and is declared to be ordained "in order to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, and secure the blessings of liberty to themselves and to their posterity." The assent of the States in their sovereign capacity is implied in calling a convention and thus submitting that instrument to the people. But the people were at perfect liberty to accept or reject it; and their act was final. It required not the affirmance, and could not be negatived, by the State governments. The Constitution, when thus adopted, was of complete obligation, and bound the State sovereignties.'

"And in Cohens v. Virginia (6 Wheat., 264, 389), Chief Justice Marshall added:

"'The people made the Constitution, and the people can unmake it. It is the creature of their will, and lives only by their will. But this supreme and irresistible power to make or unmake resides only in the whole body of the people; not in any subdivision of them. The attempt of any of the parts to exercise it is usurpation, and ought to be repelled by those to whom the people have delegated their power of repelling it.'

"Nor has the reference of proposed amendments to State legislatures under Article V in its practical working proved to be an opportunity for the people of the United States or of the several States to express their will regarding the proposed eighteenth amendment. Not only have the people of the several States had no opportunity to act upon this proposed amendment but they have been denied the opportunity, and the amendment has been ratified in entire disregard of the limitations which the people of a large number of the States have imposed upon their legislatures for the purpose of securing an opportunity to act themselves upon important subjects.

"No legislature of any State is now authorized by the people of the State to make changes in the constitution of the State. The constitutions of 28 States expressly reserve to the people themselves the right to make such changes. (Alabama, Colorado, Missouri, North Carolina, Montana, Arkansas, California, Connecticut, Florida, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Maryland, Maine, Minnesota, Nebraska, Kansas, Nevada, New Jersey, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Tennessee, Virginia, West Virginia, North Dakota, and Wyoming.) The constitutions of 15 States require the action of two successive legislatures even to propose an amendment to their constitutions. (Indiana, Art. XVI, sec. 1; Iowa, Art. X, sec. 1; New Jersey, Art. IX; New York, Art. XIV, sec. 1; Rhode Island, Art. XIII; Virginia, Art. XV, sec. 196; Wisconsin, Art. XII, sec. 1; Massachusetts, Art. IX of amendments; Tennessee, Art. XI, sec. 3; Delaware, Art. IX; Pennsylvania, Art. XVIII, sec. 1; Vermont, Art. XXV, sec. 1 of amendments; Connecticut, Art. XI; Alabama, Art. XVI, sec. 1; North Dakota, Art. XV, sec. 202.)

"The constitutions of 21 States expressly reserve to the people the power to approve or reject at the polls upon referendum any act of the legislature (see infra under point IV), and provide that any act so referred shall take effect only upon an affirmative vote by the people themselves. There can, of course, be no doubt that the Constitution of the United States is a part of every State constitution. Nor can there be any doubt that the prohibitory law now under consideration and called an amendment to the Constitution of the United States diminishes the police power of every State and impairs every State constitution. (State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 181 Pac., 920, 922, Wash.) There can be no doubt that the referendum provision in the States where it exists is applicable to the enactment of just such a prohibitory law as this on the part of the State legislature. Those who assert the validity of these ratifications do not claim that at the time the so-called eighteenth amendment was proposed it was the will of the people of the United States to be represented in matters of constitutional change by the State legislatures. When the legislatures acted upon the proposal they did so, rightly or wrongly, not because the people of their State chose to speak through them or were in fact represented by them but solely in the alleged exercise of the agency or authority granted the State legislatures by Article V of the Constitution more than a century ago. In some States the action of the State legislature was in express violation of the commands of the people of the State. Thus, in Florida the State constitution prohibits any State legislature from acting upon a proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States unless the legislature had been elected after the amendment was proposed. (Art. XVI, sec. 19.) Yet a legislature of Florida, one branch of which, at least, was elected in 1916, before the amendment was proposed, ratified the amendment and is counted in the list of ratifying States. And in Missouri the State constitution forbids any legislature from ratifying an amendment of the Constitution of the United States which may in anywise impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of that State. (Art. II, sec. 3.) Yet the Legislature of Missouri ratified this amendment in direct violation of that command of the people.

"Moreover, in some States the action of the State legislature was directly contrary to recent popular votes. In some States—e. g., Ohio—elections have been held since a ratification, and the popular vote has been against such a law as the legislature had seen fit to enact by ratifying the amendment.

"This general disregard of any right of the people of the States to a voice in this matter is justified only upon the ground that the State legislatures are not legislating or acting at all under their State constitutions, but that they are executing a special power granted to them by Article V of the Constitution of the United States. (Opinion of the Justices, 107 Atl., 673, Sup. Ct., Maine.) The validity of their action in this aspect must, therefore, be determined by examining the terms of that power.

"2. The document to be amended is the Constitution of the United States. A constitution is a special kind of instrument as certain in its character and definite in its limitations as are any written instruments known to the law. The full expression for which this word stands is 'the constitution of government.' (See, e. g., The Federalist, No. 33 (Ford's ed.), pp. 260, 263; 2 Elliot's Debates, pp. 126, 128; 4 id., p. 176.)

"'When we talk of a constitution of a State or nation we mean those of its rules or laws which determine the form of its government and the respective rights and duties of the government toward the citizens, and of the citizens toward the government.' (1 Bryce's American Commonwealth, p. 350.)

"'A constitution "is a permanent form of government."' (Story on the Constitution, 5th ed., sec. 352.)

"'A constitution is "that body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised."' (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., p. 4.)

"'By the constitution of a commonwealth is meant primarily its make-up as a political organization; that special adjustment of instrumentalities, powers, and functions by which its form and operation are determined.' (Jameson, 4th ed., sec. 63.)

"'It is the form of government delineated by the mighty hand of the people by which certain first principles of fundamental law are established.' (Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 Dallas 304, 308.)

"'Constitution: A system of fundamental principles, maxims, laws, or rules embodied in written documents or established by prescriptive usage for the government of a nation, State, society, corporation, or association, as the Constitution of the United States, the British constitution, the constitution of the State of New York, the constitution of the social club, etc. In American legal usage the constitution is the organic law of a State or of the Nation, the adoption of which by the people constitutes the political organization as distinguished from the statutes made by the political organization acting under the order of things thus constituted.' (Century Dictionary.)

"'In its modern use constitution has been restricted to those rules which concern the political structure of society. If we take the accepted definition of a law as a command imposed by a sovereign on the subject, the constitution would consist of the rules which point out where the sovereign is to be found, the form in which his powers are exercised, and the relations of the different members of the sovereign body to each other where it consists of more persons than one. In every independent political society it is assumed by these definitions there will be found somewhere or other a sovereign, whether that sovereign be a single person or a body of persons, or several bodies of persons. The commands imposed by the sovereign persons or a body on the rest of the society are positive laws properly so called. The sovereign body not only makes laws, but has two other leading functions, viz, those of judicature and administration. Legislation is for the most part performed directly by the sovereign body itself. Judicature and administration for the most part by delegates. The constitution of a society accordingly would show how the sovereign body is composed and what are the relations of its members inter se, and how the sovereign functions of legislation, judicature, and administration are exercised.' (Encyclopedia Britannica, 9th ed.)

"'A constitution is sometimes defined as the fundamental law of a State, containing the principles upon which the government is founded, regulating the division of the sovereign powers, and directing to what persons each of these powers is to be confided, and the manner in which it is to be exercised. Perhaps an equally complete and accurate definition would be that body of rules and maxims in accordance with which the powers of sovereignty are habitually exercised.

"'In a much qualified and very imperfect sense every State may be said to possess a constitution; that is to say, some leading principle has prevailed in the administration of its government, until it has become an understood part of its system, to which obedience is expected and habitually yielded; like the hereditary principle in most monarchies, and the custom of choosing the chieftain by the body of the people, which prevails among some barbarous tribes. But the term constitutional government is applied only to those whose fundamental rules or maxims not only locate the sovereign power in individuals or bodies designated or chosen in some prescribed manner, but also define the limits of its exercise so as to protect individual rights, and shield them against the assumption of arbitrary power. The number of these is not great, and the protection they afford to individual rights is far from being uniform.

"'In American constitutional law the word constitution is used in a restricted sense, as implying the written instrument agreed upon by the people of the Union or of any of the States, as the absolute rule of action and decision for all departments and officers of the Government, in respect to all the points covered by it, until it shall be changed by the authority which established it, and in opposition to which any act or regulation of any such department or officer, or even of the people themselves, will be altogether void.' (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., pp. 2, 3.)

"'The primary function of constitutional law is to ascertain the political center of gravity of any given State. It announces in what portion of the whole is to be found "internal sovereignty," "supremata potesta," "Staatsgewalt," * * *. In other words, it defines the form of government. * * *

"'The definition of the sovereign power in a State necessarily leads to the consideration of its component parts. * * * With reference to all these questions constitutional law enters into minute detail. It prescribes the order of succession to the throne; or, in a republic, the mode of electing a president. It provides for the continuity of the executive power. It enumerates the "prerogative" of the king, or other chief magistrate. It regulates the composition of the council of State, and of the upper and lower houses of the assembly, when the assembly is thus divided; the mode in which a seat is acquired in the upper house, whether by succession, nomination, election, or tenure of office; the mode of electing the members of the house of representatives; the powers and privileges of the assembly as a whole, and of the individuals who compose it; and the machinery of lawmaking. It deals also with the ministers, their responsibility, and their respective spheres of action; the government offices and their organization; the armed forces of the State, their control and the mode in which they are recruited; the relation, if any, between church and State; the judges and their immunities, their power, if any, of disallowing as unconstitutional the acts of nonsovereign legislative bodies; local self-government; the relations between the mother country and its colonies and dependencies. It describes the portions of the earth's surface over which the sovereignty of the State extends, and defines the persons who are subject to its authority. It comprises, therefore, rules for the ascertainment of nationality, and for regulating the acquisition of a new nationality by "naturalization." It declares the rights of the State over its subjects in respect of their liability to military conscription, to service as jurymen, and otherwise. It declares, on the other hand, the rights of the subjects to be assisted and protected by the State, and of that narrower class of subjects which enjoys full civic right to hold public offices and to elect their representatives to the assembly or parliament of the nation. * * *

"'A constitution has been well defined as "l'ensemble des institutions et des lois fondamentales, destinées à régler l'action de l'administration et de tous les citoyens." (Holland's Jurisprudence, 11th ed., p. 365.)

"'Before proceeding to the task indicated, however, it may be useful to ascertain with precision the distinction between a "constitution" or "fundamental ordinance" and an "ordinary municipal law." Both must be denominated laws, since they are equally "rules of action laid down or prescribed by a superior." (Worcester's Dictionary, in verb.) Ordinary laws are enactments and rules for the government of civil conduct, promulgated by the legislative authority of a State, or deduced from long-established usage. It is an important characteristic of such laws that they are tentatory, occasional, and in the nature of temporary expedients. Fundamental laws, on the other hand, in politics, are expressions of the sovereign will in relation to the structure of the government, the extent and distribution of its powers, the modes and principles of its operation, and the apparatus of checks and balances proper to insure its integrity and continued existence. Fundamental laws are primary, being the commands of the sovereign establishing the governmental machine and the most general rules for its operation. Ordinary laws are secondary, being commands of the sovereign, having reference to the exigencies of time and place, resulting from the ordinary working of the machine. Fundamental laws precede ordinary laws in point of time, and embrace the settled policy of the State. Ordinary laws are the creatures of the sovereign, acting through a body of functionaries existing only by virtue of the fundamental laws, and express, as we have said, the expedient or the right viewed as the expedient under the varying circumstances of time and place.' (Jameson, The Constitutional Convention, sec. 85.)

"Nor was there any misunderstanding among the people who sent the delegates to the convention of 1787 as to what a constitution was. (Madison Works, Vol. IX, p. 383: 'The constitution is a bill of powers.' See also The Federalist, No. 53 (Ford's ed.), pp. 354–355; id., No. 41, p. 260, and No. 45, p. 309.)

"At the very beginning of constitution making in the American States the Legislature of Massachusetts drafted a constitution and sent it to the towns for approval. It was considered in the town of Concord on the 21st of October, 1776, and the town records show that it was—

"'Voted unanimously that the present house of representatives is not a proper body to form a constitution for this State, and voted to choose a committee of five men to make answer to the question proposed by the house of representatives of this State and to give the reasons why the town thinks them not a suitable body for that purpose. * * * And the committee reported the following draft, which, being read several times over for consideration, it then was read resolve by resolve and accepted unanimously in a very full town meeting. The reasons are as follows:

"'Resolved, First, that this State being at present destitute of a properly established form of government, it is absolutely necessary that one should be immediately formed and established.

"'Resolved, Secondly, that the supreme legislative, either in their proper capacity or in joint committee, are by no means a body proper to form and establish a constitution or form of government, for reasons following, viz: First, because we conceive that constitution in its proper idea intends a system of principles established to secure the subject in the possession of and enjoyment of their rights and privileges against any encroachment of the governing part. Secondly, because the same body that forms a constitution have of consequence a power to alter it. Thirdly, because a constitution alterable by the supreme legislative is no security at all to the subject against the encroachment of the governing part on any or on all their rights and privileges.

"'Resolved, Thirdly, that it appears to this town highly expedient that a convention or congress be immediately chosen to form and establish a constitution by the inhabitants of the respective towns in this State being free and 21 years and upward, in proportion as the representatives of this State were formerly chosen; the convention or congress not to consist of a greater number than the house of assembly of this State heretofore might consist of, except that each town and district shall have liberty to send one representative, or otherwise, as shall appear meet to the inhabitants of this State in general.

"'Resolved, Fourthly, that when the convention or congress have formed a constitution they adjourn for a short time and publish their proposed constitution for the inspection and remarks of the inhabitants of this State.

"'Resolved, Fifthly, that the honorable house of assembly of this State be desired to recommend it to the inhabitants of this State to proceed to choose a convention or congress for the purpose above mentioned as soon as possible.' (Roger Sherman Hoar in The Constitutional Review, April, 1918, p. 97.)

"In the same year the people of western Massachusetts refused to permit the courts to sit until a constitution was established determining the powers of government. The ground of their action was set forth in a petition to the general court by the people of the town of Pittsfield in May, 1776. In this petition they said (Mass. Law Quarterly, May, 1918, p. 334):

"'That since the dissolution of the power of Great Britain over these Colonies they have fallen into a state of nature; that the first step to be taken by a people in such a state for the enjoyment or restoration of civil government among them is the formation of a fundamental constitution as the basis and groundwork of legislation; that the approbation by the majority of the people of this fundamental constitution is absolutely necessary to give life and being to it; that then and not till then is the foundation laid for legislation.

"'What is the fundamental constitution of this province? What are the unalienable rights of the people, the power of the rulers, how often to be elected by the people, etc.; have any of these things yet been ascertained? Let it not be said by future posterity that in this great, this noble, this glorious contest we made no provision against tyranny among ourselves.'

"3. The instrument framed by the Constitutional Convention of 1787 answered strictly to this conception of the nature of a constitution. It dealt solely with the powers of government.

"It is needless to recount the familiar story of the Confederation of 1778, the complete failure of the Congress of the Confederation to govern through lack of power, the chaos which had resulted, and the imminent danger that the American experiment in self-government would end in anarchy. The Federalist, No. 15 (Ford's ed.), p. 87 et seq.

"The recommendation of the Annapolis convention of 1786, the act passed by the Confederate Congress on the 21st of February, 1787, recommending to the States to send delegates to the Philadelphia Convention, every act passed by the legislatures of the several States, and the credentials of every delegate to the convention, stated the purpose of the convention and the duties and powers of the delegates in terms addressed solely to such action as should 'render the Federal Constitution adequate to the "exigencies of government and the preservation of the Union."' The first in order of time were the credentials from the State of New Hampshire, and they illustate all the rest. They were as follows:

"'And whereas the limited powers which by the Articles of Confederation are vested in the Congress of the United States have been found far inadequate to the enlarged purposes which they were intended to produce, and whereas Congress hath by repeated and most urgent representations endeavored to awaken these and other States of the Union to a sense of the utterly critical and alarming situation in which they may inevitably be involved unless timely measures be taken to enlarge the powers of Congress that they may be thereby enabled to avert the dangers which threaten our existence as a free and independent people, * * * Be it therefore enacted * * * that John Langdon, etc., be and hereby are appointed commissioners * * * to confer with such deputies as are or may be appointed by the other States for similar purposes, and with them to discuss and decide upon the most effectual means to remedy the defects of our Federal Union and to procure and secure the enlarged purposes which it was intended to effect.'

"Accordingly, the Constitutional Convention that met in Philadelphia performed its proper task. The Constitution which was agreed upon and proposed granted enlarged powers to the Government of the Union. It distributed those powers and directed how they should be exercised. It imposed limitations on the powers granted and upon the powers reserved for the protection of those inalienable rights to secure which governments are instituted. Nowhere in any of the acts preliminary to the convention, or in any action taken by the convention, or in any proposal or argument made in the convention, was there any suggestion that the convention itself should exercise any legislative power of government, or should propose the exercise of such a power in connection with the Constitution by any legislature or convention or people acting upon the Constitution. The sole and exclusive function of the delegates, the convention, and the ratifying bodies, was the formation of a Government adequate to the exercise of all useful power, and never themselves to exercise powers in lieu of or under the Government so formed.

"Therefore, when the Constitution was formed, Justice Patterson could properly say of it:

"'What are legislatures? Creatures of the Constitution. They owe their existence to the Constitution. They derive their power from the Constitution. It is their commission; and therefore all their acts must be conformable to it, or else they will be void. The Constitution is the work or will of the people themselves in their original sovereign and unlimited capacity. Law is the work or will of the legislature in their derivative and subordinate capacity. The one is the work of the creator, and the other of the creature. The Constitution fixes limits to the exercise of the legislative authority, and prescribes the orbit within which it must move. In short, the Constitution is the sun of the political system, around which all legislative, executive, and judicial bodies must revolve.' (Vanhorne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 Dallas, 304, 308.)

"And so, Chief Justice Marshall could say in Marbury v. Madison (1 Cranch, 137, 176):

"'That the people have an original right to establish for their future government such principles as in their opinion shall most conduce to their own happiness is the basis on which the whole American fabric has been erected. The exercise of this original right is a very great exertion; nor can it nor ought it to be frequently repeated. The principles, therefore, so established are deemed fundamental. And as the authority from which they proceed is supreme, and can seldom act, they are designed to be permanent.

"'This original and supreme will organizes the Government, and assigns to different departments their respective powers. It may either stop here, or establish certain limits not to be transcended by those departments.

"'The Government of the United States is of the latter description. The powers of the legislature are defined and limited; and that those limits may not be mistaken, or forgotten, the Constitution is written.'

"It follows, therefore, that the thing to be amended under the terms of Article V of the Constitution of the United States would be the form of government, the distribution of the powers of government, and the regulation of the exercise thereof, which made up 'The Constitution of Civil Government' of the United States.

"4. The authority to amend granted by Article V is necessarily limited to changes in this grant, distribution and regulation of powers which made up the Constitution, and it did not confer upon the amending authorities or agents the right themselves to exercise the legislative power of government.

"The word 'amend' has a necessary relation to some particular thing which is to be amended. The word has no meaning whatever except in relation to that thing. The change for better or worse which is called an amendment must be a change in the particular thing amended.

"The necessary relation of amendment to the thing to be amended is ordinarily expressed by the rule that amendments must be germane. A legislative body may have power to legislate upon two different subjects and may incorporate its enactments upon both in the same bill or resolution, but the provisions relating to one subject may not be in any sense an amendment to the provisions relating to the other subject. There are, then, two separate exercises of legislative power, neither one depending upon the other.

"The function of an amendment was well stated in an opinion by the attorney general of Pennsylvania rendered in 1883, as follows:

"'To amend a thing, as defined by Webster, is to change it in any way for the better; to remove what is erroneous, superfluous, faulty, and the like, to supply deficiencies, to substitute something in place of what is removed. The word is synonymous with "correct," "reform," "rectify." An amendment, therefore, is a change or alteration for the better, a correction of faults or errors, an improvement, a reformation, an emendation. It necessarily implies something upon which the correction, alteration, improvement, or reformation can operate, something to be reformed, corrected, rectified, altered, or improved. In other words, that which is proposed as an amendment must be germane to or relate to the thing to be amended. In respect to the amendment of a charter of a corporation the amendment must relate to the charter as originally granted, and if it does not correct, improve, reform, rectify, or alter something in the original charter, it is not properly speaking an amendment to that charter.' (In re Pennsylvania Tel. Co., 2 Chester County Rep., 129. See also 2 Morawetz on Corporations (2d ed.), sec. 1096.)

"The rule that amendments must be germane to the thing amended was in force and well understood in the United States when the Constitution was adopted. Thus the Continental Congress had adopted the following rule as early as July 8, 1784:

"'No new motion or proposition shall be admitted under color of amendment as a substitute for the motion or proposition under debate until it is postponed or disagreed to.' (5 Hinds' Precedents, secs. 5753, 5767.)

"The First Congress, under the Constitution, on the 7th of April, 1789, readopted the rule above quoted, omitting the words 'until it is postponed or disagreed to,' and that rule was readopted in the revision of rules on the 3d of March, 1822, without substantial change, so as to read:

"'No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment'; and this rule remains as section 7 of the present House Rule No. 16, as follows:

"'No motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration shall be admitted under color of amendment.'

"Hinds' Digest and Manual, published in the second session of the Fifty-ninth Congress, contains at page 326 et seq., an enumeration of propositions offered as amendments to pending bills, but rejected because held not to be germane.

"It is to be observed that the form of this rule, established as far back as 1784, is decisive upon the question now under consideration, for it denies to any motion or proposition on a subject different from that under consideration, the quality of an amendment, and prohibits its admission 'under color of amendment.'

"There is curious and interesting evidence that the framers of the Constitution observed this rule. The reader of the Journal of the Federal Convention will find that on the 10th of September, 1787, the article relating to the amendment of the Constitution was under consideration, and various amendments to the provision were proposed and voted on, when a motion was made 'to postpone the consideration of the amendment in order to take up the following.' Then followed the provision regarding amendment which now appears in Article V of the Constitution. It appears by Madison's Notes (p. 712) that it was Mr. Madison himself who moved this postponement. The same thing occurs scores of times in the proceedings of the convention. The first motion, made on the 30th of May, was of this description. When a provision had been put into such shape that it was considered generally satisfactory, instead of moving it as an amendment or a substitute the motion was to postpone the consideration of whatever was before the convention and to take up the provision as new matter. This is a form of procedure quite unknown to modern parliamentary practice, and it is plain that it resulted from the rule of the Continental Congress above quoted forbidding the admission under color of amendment of matter different from that under consideration until that is 'postponed or disagreed to.' Thus the rule that amendments must be germane was followed by the convention that framed the Constitution and in the adoption of Article V itself. (In the Passenger Cases (7 How., 283, 477) Taney, C. J., said: 'The members of the convention unquestionably used the words they inserted in the Constitution in the same sense in which they used them in their debates.')

"Mr. Madison correctly stated the rule of relation between the amendment and the thing amended in the convention on the 13th day of August, 1787. The subject under consideration was the power of the Senate to amend money bills. Mr. Madison said (Madison's Notes, 3 Documentary History of the Constitution, p. 518):

"'The words amend or alter form an equal source of doubt and altercation. When an obnoxious paragraph shall be sent down from the Senate to the House of Representatives it will be called an origination under the name of an amendment. The Senate may actually couch extraneous matter under that name. In these cases the question will turn on the degree of connection between the matter and object of the bill and the alteration or amendment offered to it. Can there be a more fruitful source of dispute, or a kind of dispute more difficult to be settled? His apprehensions on this point were not conjectural. Disputes had actually flowed from this course in Virginia where the Senate can originate no bill.' Identical views were expressed in the constitutional conventions of the States where it was frequently charged that the proposed constitution was not in any sense an amendment of the Articles of Confederation, but an entirely new creation. (See 3 Elliot's Debates, pp. 61, 614.)

"The same conception of the character of amendments is followed in judicial procedure. The First Congress under the Constitution in the judiciary act of 1789 reproduced the English statute of amendment now appearing in the Revised Statutes, sections 899 to 901 and 954. The amendments authorized all follow strictly the rule of relevancy to the pleading or proceeding to be amended.

"Regarding this kind of amendment this court has said:

"'This power to amend, too, must not be confounded with the power to create. It presupposes an existing record, which is defective by reason of some clerical error or mistake, or the omission of some entry which should have been made during the progress of the case, or by the loss of some document originally filed therein. The difference between creating and amending a record is analogous to that between the construction and repair of a piece of personal property. If a house or vessel, for instance, be burned or otherwise lost, it can only be rebuilt, and the word "repair" is wholly inapplicable to its subsequent reconstruction. The word "repair," as the word "amend," contemplates an existing structure which has become imperfect by reason of the action of the elements or otherwise. In the cases of vessels particularly, this distinction is one which can not be ignored, as it lies at the basis of an important diversity of jurisdiction between the common law and maritime courts. (Gagnon v. United States, 193 U. S., 451, 457.)

"'Nor is a complainant at liberty to abandon the entire case made by his bill, and make a new and different case by way of amendment. We apprehend that the true rule on this subject is laid down by the vice chancellor in Verplanck v. The Mercantile Insurance Co. (1 Edwards Ch. R., 46). Under the privilege of amending, a party is not to be permitted to make a new bill. Amendments can only be allowed when the bill is found defective in proper parties, in its prayer for relief, or in the omission or mistake of some fact or circumstance connected with the substance of the case, but not forming the substance itself, or for putting in issue new matter to meet allegations in the answer. * * * To insert a wholly different case is not properly an amendment, and should not be considered within the rules on that subject.' (Shields v. Barrow, 17 How., 130, 144.)

"The argument in support of article 5 in the Federalist exhibits this same view of the character of an amendment. Mr. Madison said:

"'That useful alterations will be suggested by experience could not but be foreseen. It was requisite, therefore, that a mode for introducing them should be provided. The mode preferred by the convention seems to be stamped with every mark of propriety. It guards equally against that extreme facility which would render the Constitution too mutable, and that extreme difficulty which might perpetuate its discovered faults. It moreover equally enables the General and the State Governments to originate the amendment of errors, as they may be pointed out by the experience on one side or on the other.' (The Federalist, No. 43 (Ford's ed.), p. 291.)

"Mr. Hamilton said:

"'In opposition to the probability of subsequent amendments it has been urged that the persons delegated to the administration of the National Government will always be disinclined to yield up any portion of the authority of which they were once possessed. For my own part I acknowledge a thorough conviction that any amendments which may upon mature consideration be thought useful will be applicable to the organization of the Government, not to the mass of its powers; and on this account alone I think there is no weight in the observation just stated.' (The Federalist, No. 85 (Ford's ed.), p. 586.)

"John Marshall said:

"'He tells you that it is an absurdity to adopt before you amend. Is the object of your adoption to mend solely? The objects of your adoption are union, safety against foreign enemies, and a protection against faction—against what has been the destruction of all republics. These impel you to its adoption. If you adopt it, what shall restrain you from amending it, if in trying it, amendments shall be found necessary? The Government is not supported by force, but depending on our free will. When experience shall show us any inconveniences we can then correct it. But, until we have experience on the subject, amendments as well as the Constitution itself are to try. Let us try it and keep our hands free to change it when necessary. If it be necessary to change government, let us change that government which has been found to be defective. The difficulty we find in amending the Confederation will not be found in amending this Constitution. Any amendments in the system before you will not go to a radical change; a plain way is pointed out for the purpose; all will be interested to change it, and therefore all exert themselves in getting the change.' (In the Virginia Convention, 3 Elliot's Debates, 233-234.)

"The distinction between the amendment of a constitution and lawmaking under a constitution was well stated by the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania in passing upon the question whether the amendment provision in the constitution of that State called for submission to the governor of resolutions passed under it. The court said:

"'It is also necessary to bear in mind the character of the work for which it provides. It is constitution making; it is a concentration of all the power of the people in establishing organic law for the Commonwealth, for it is provided by the article that "if such amendment or amendments shall be approved by a majority of those voting thereon, such amendment or amendments shall be a part of the constitution." It is not lawmaking which is a distinct and separate function, but it is a specific exercise of the power of a people to make its constitution.' (Commonwealth v. Griest, 196 Pa. Stat., 396, 404.)

"And the Supreme Court of Maryland has said in a similar case, relating to an amendment of the Maryland constitution, that the amending clause has 'no relation whatever to legislation * * * the two subjects are widely disconnected in location and substance.' (Warfield v. Vandiver, 101 Md., 78.)

"The sound rule has been accurately stated by the Supreme Court of California, as follows:

"'The very term "constitution" implies an instrument of a permanent and abiding nature, and the provisions contained therein for its revision indicate the will of the people that the underlying principles upon which it rests, as well as the substantial entirety of the instrument, shall be of a like permanent and abiding nature. On the other hand, the significance of the term "amendment" implies such an addition or change within the lines of the original instrument as will effect an improvement or better carry out the purpose for which it was framed.' (Livermore v. Waite, 102 Calif., 113, 118, 119.)

"The Supreme Court of Missouri deciding that an ordinary law could not be made an amendment to the constitution by merely going through the forms of amendment said in State ex rel. v. Roach (230 Mo., 411, 433, 435):

"'The purpose of constitutional provisions and amendments to the constitution is to prescribe the permanent framework and a uniform system of government and to assign to the different departments thereof their respective powers and duties. * * * The mere calling it an amendment to the constitution, unless the subject matter verifies the correctness of that name, is not binding.'

"5. It appears, therefore, that both the ordinary and natural meaning of the terms used in Article V, as well as the purpose to be accomplished, limit the authority granted by the article to changes in the system of government; that is, changes in the distribution and regulation of governmental powers.

"The rule for the construction of the Constitution laid down in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1, 188) is controlling in the construction of Article V, viz:

"'As men whose intentions require no concealment generally employ the words which most directly and aptly express the ideas they intend to convey, the enlightened patriots who framed our Constitution and the people who adopted it must be understood to have employed words in their natural sense and to have intended what they have said. If from the imperfection of human language there should be serious doubts respecting the extent of any given power, it is a well-settled rule that the objects for which it was given—especially when those objects are expressed in the instrument itself—should have great influence in the construction. We know of no reason for excluding this rule from the present case. The grant does not convey power which might be beneficial to the grantor if retained by himself or which can inure solely to the benefit of the grantee, but is an investment of power for the general advantage in the hands of agents selected for that purpose, which power can never be exercised by the people themselves, but must be placed in the hands of agents or lie dormant. We know of no rule for construing the extent of such powers other than is given by the language of the instrument which confers them, taken in connection with the purposes for which they were conferred.'

"This rule is of universal application. All grants of power are necessarily limited by the nature of the subject matter to which they relate. (Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall., 386, 388; Fletcher v. Peck, 6 Cranch, 87, 139; Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655, 663; Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 15, 44.) That is what confines the exercise of the judicial power to questions which are in their nature justiciable, and that is what confines the exercise of the taxing power to things which in the nature of our dual government are subject to taxation. (The Collector v. Day, 11 Wall., 113, 127.)

"6. That the power to amend the Constitution does not include the power of independent legislation by the amending agents is clearly indicated by the rulings, both in the National and State courts, that the proceedings of Congress and of the State legislatures are not ordinary legislation, and for that reason the resolutions on the one hand proposing amendments, and on the other ratifying them, do not require to be submitted to the President and to the governors under the general provisions which in terms apply to all bills, orders, resolutions, and votes. (Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dallas, 378; and the State cases cited, supra.)

"The decisions above quoted in the main applied to constitutional amendments which were properly so called, but the decisions were based not upon the particular terms of the amendments but upon the character of the power. In denying to the exercise of the power the quality of ordinary legislation, they necessarily exclude authority to legislate under the power. As Hamilton said in the Federalist, No. 33 (Ford's edition), page 202:

"'What is a power but the ability or faculty of doing a thing? What is the ability to do a thing but the power of employing the means necessary to its execution? What is a legislative power but the power of making laws? What are the means to execute a legislative power but laws?'

"7. That Article V granted to the donees of the power no authority to exercise legislative powers under the Constitution is conclusively established by Article I of the Constitution.

"This provides in section 1 that—

"'All legislative powers herein granted shall be vested in a Congress of the United States, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives,'

"and the subsequent sections prescribe the manner in which that power shall be exercised.

"This grant of power is exclusive. It admits of no other power of legislation under the Constitution. It necessarily confines the exercise of the power of amendment to its natural and proper function of changing the framework of government and excludes it from the exercise of legislative powers under that government.

"By what authority, then, is a citizen of the State of New Jersey prohibited from carrying on his business? What sovereign issues the command? Is it the Government of the United States? This law is an exercise of police power not granted to the Government of the United States but reserved to the States or the people by the tenth amendment to the Constitution. Is it the State of New Jersey? The law of New Jersey permits the business. Is it the people of the United States? The people of the United States have not acted, except as they acted in the adoption of the original Constitution. Is it the people acting through their agents authorized by the Constitution? The Constitution itself expressly excludes those agents from the exercise of legislative power.

"8. The exercise of the power of ordinary legislation through the forms of amendment under Article V would be inconsistent with the fundamental principles of the Constitution, because it would prevent the rule of the majority.

"It would be inconsistent with what Hamilton in the twenty-second number of the Federalist (Ford's ed., p. 135) called—

"'the fundamental maxim of republican government, which requires that the sense of the majority should prevail.'

"Under the American constitutional system as it existed prior to the 16th day of January, 1920, the laws which have controlled the conduct of life and fulfilled the function of government to secure the inalienable rights of the individual in the United States have been always within the control of the majority, subject only to certain universal limitations upon governmental power in favor of individual liberty. Subject to these limitations, the sum total of legislative power under the Constitution was complete. Within the field of the enumerated powers the majority represented in the National Congress was always competent to act. Within the field of the reserved powers of the States the majority in each State was always competent to act, even as to constitutional amendments. In this country of rapid development and growth, of constantly changing conditions, of education and new experience in the science of government, of experiment and change, success and failure in legislation, in every generation, in every Congress, at every stage, the people, who are the source of power, were competent to make their laws answer to their judgment from time to time upon the problems of their day. This should continue true no matter how much the distribution of power may be changed by constitutional amendment.

"If, however, Article V be now construed to confer upon the amending authorities the power to pass ordinary laws which would take effect as amendments of the Constitution, then those laws would be withdrawn from the control of the majority, both in the State and in the Nation. From the time such a law is passed it becomes practically irrepealable and unamendable by the majority.

"It can only be repealed or amended by a vote of two-thirds of both Houses of Congress and three-quarters of the States. In future years and in future generations the majority of the people of the United States would be helpless to change that law, for three-quarters of the States must unite in order that any change be made. This requirement has no relation to the will of the majority of States, or to the will of the majority of the citizens of the United States, for the one-quarter of the States refusing their consent to a change might be those of the least population, and the overwhelming majority of the people of the country might desire the change, but, nevertheless, would not be able to bring it about. Under the census of 1910 there were 13 States which altogether contained less than 5 per cent of the population of the United States, whilst 12 States contained 55 per cent of the population and much more of the wealth of the country.

"If a generation ago a law had been passed in the form prescribed by Article V imposing limitations upon the conduct of private life throughout the United States which more than 95 per cent of the people of the United States had now come to regard as unwise and injurious, the 95 per cent would be helpless as against the opposition of the other 5 per cent. If this prohibitory law 'under color of amendment' to the Constitution be a valid exercise of power under Article V, and the people of the United States 5 years, 10 years, 20 years, or more hence come to the conclusion that it was an unwise law, they will then be powerless, for upon that subject the majority will no longer control. Thus the construction claimed by the advocates of the power is that Article V empowers one generation to control all future generations and deprive them of the power of governing themselves according to the will of the majority.

"It is not difficult to conjecture that it was, in fact, for this purpose that the sponsors of the so-called eighteenth amendment determined to pass this law themselves instead of amending the Constitution by adding to the enumerated powers of the General Government the power to regulate the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. The practical difference between the two is that if the present attempt succeed the law will be irrepealable by future majorities. (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., p. 50.)

"9. There is an essential difference in respect of the control of the majority between an amendment of the Constitution by a new transfer of power to the National Government and an alleged amendment of the Constitution by the exercise of legislative power on the part of the amending authorities.

"All legislative bodies are but instruments for the making of laws. Whether the lawmaking power be vested in a National Congress or a State legislature, in one chamber or two, or in the people voting directly under a referendum or initiative, the object is to secure the enactment of such laws as the majority of the people wish to be governed by. That is the object, while the form and method of procedure of the legislative body are but the means.

"Whatever be the Constitution and method of procedure of the body exercising legislative power, all free, self-governing peoples see to it that they themselves are always able to control the exercise of the power in accordance with the will of the majority. There are strong reasons for making the form of government stable, for having the distribution of powers once agreed upon preserved, unless there be general consent to a change, and for having the powers and duties of particular officers and the limitations upon them well understood and determined by interpretation and usage, so long as the forms and methods agreed upon and prescribed still leave to the people themselves the power to say what laws shall govern them, whether they say it through direct vote themselves, or whether they say it by making their representatives responsive to their will by electing those who please them and turning out of office those who displease them. The provisions of Article V, therefore, which make the Constitution and any amendment of the Constitution unchangeable except by the consent of three-quarters of the State legislatures, if confined to the make-up of government, would not be in derogation of the control of a majority over their laws.

"The distinction between the form of government which is embodied in the Constitution, and the legislative product of government which must always be under the control of the majority if free government is to continue, is well illustrated by the development of free government in Great Britain, which, leaving the king in office, more than a generation ago deprived him of the veto power, and which recently, leaving the hereditary House of Lords in office, has deprived that house of the power to prevent the enactment of laws by the Commons, who are always responsive to the popular will.

"If the same limitations upon change, however, are to be applied, not to the form but to the product of government, so that the laws which issue from the governing power are to be permanently beyond the control of the majority, then the essential quality of free self-government will be destroyed. It is unreasonable to impute to the framers of the Constitution and to the conventions which ratified it a purpose to permit any such result by authorizing, under color of an amendment to the Constitution, the enactment of ordinary laws in such manner as to withdraw them from the control of the majority of the people. (This contention is substantiated by much that was said in the various conventions. Thus, for example, Hamilton said in the New York convention (2 Elliot's Debates, p. 364): 'Constitutions should consist only of general provisions: the reason is that they must necessarily be permanent and that they can not calculate for the possible change of things;' and Johnson said in the North Carolina convention (4 id., p. 188): 'Are laws as immutable as constitutions? Can anything be more absurd than assimilating the one to the other? The idea is not warranted by the Constitution, nor consistent with reason.' See also Iredell, 4 id., p. 144.)

"This is emphasized by the interesting circumstance that the clause providing for the passage of a bill over the veto of the President, as originally adopted by the convention of 1787, required a vote of three-quarters of each house, and that this was changed to two-thirds at the very close of the convention upon the avowed ground that to require a three-fourths vote would make it too difficult to repeal bad laws. (Madison's Notes of Sept. 12, 1787, p. 720 et seq.)

"10. The impression prevailing in many quarters that the kind of legislation under color of amendment which is attempted by the alleged eighteenth amendment is permissible arises from the fact that many States have pursued the practice of including in their State constitutions ordinary legislative provisions.

"There is, however, a radical difference. Subject to the great limitations which political liberty ever requires to be imposed upon all government, the people of a State can do whatever they please with their constitution, and all State constitutions are made by the people themselves, acting by majority vote. Every State constitution, however, is subject to alteration at will by the majority of the people of the State, so that the inclusion of an ordinary legislative provision in the same instrument which prescribes the form and regulates the powers of the State government does not withdraw any legislation from the control of the majority. It merely substitutes popular legislation for representative legislation. It is merely one form of expressing lack of confidence in the State legislature, and withdraws from them a certain measure of legislative power to be exercised and always controlled by the people. It is, in principle, the precise opposite to the action which is now attempted under Article V of the Constitutiton of the United States.

"The element of negotiation and agreement between the several States in the making of the Constitution involved methods, both in the original making and in the procedure for amendment, wholly inapplicable to the making of ordinary laws, and in this respect is sharply distinguished from constitution making in the States, where a popular majority always makes and alters at will both the constitution and the laws.

"It is indisputable that the Constitution of the United States created a Nation, perpetual and indissoluble, endowed with all the attributes of sovereignty within the field limited in the instrument itself. This instrument received its efficacy not from the State governments but from the people of the several States, and when that grant of power had been made the people of all the thirteen States theretofore united under the confederation became parts of the one people of the United States, constituting the new Nation and subject to the authority of the new Government. (Legal Tender Cases, 12 Wall., 125; Texas v. White, 7 Wall., 700, 720, 724; Sturges v. Crowninshield, 4 Wheat., 122, 192; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, 403.)

"The process, however, by which this result was reached was a process of negotiation between the representatives of the separate States and of consent by the people in the several States. The consents were several and independent as to the people in each State. The new Government acquired no authority over the territory of the inhabitants of any particular State until the people of that State had given their assent. That followed necessarily from the independent sovereignty of each State as it existed on the 17th day of September, 1787. (Gibbons v. Ogden, 9 Wheat., 1, 187.) Accordingly, the Constitution provided that—

"'The ratification of the conventions of nine States shall be sufficient for the establishment of this Constitution between the States so ratifying the same.'

"There was no idea of the exercise of any authority or coercion over the people of any State against their will. When New Hampshire on the 21st of June, 1788, became the ninth State ratifying the Constitution, the new Government of the new Nation came into being with no authority over the territory or the people of the remaining four States. The authority of the new Government in each of the other States began when that State gave its consent—in Virginia, June 26, 1788; in New York, July 26, 1788; in Rhode Island, May 29, 1789; and in North Carolina, November 21, 1789.

"The Constitution thus received its vitality, not from the vote of a majority of the people of the United States but from the consents of the people of the several States.

"The result of the process was the formation of an indissoluble Union. The consents given were irrevocable. The bond created was the bond not merely of contract but of allegiance. The method by which this result was obtained was the method not of coercive law, but of free consent. In that process no account whatever was taken of the will of a majority of the people of the United States as such. The sole question was as to the will of the majority of the people in each separate State to grant away a portion of their power within their own territory. The majority in Delaware counted just as much as the majority in Virginia, because each carried the consent of a State, and the number of individuals had no weight whatever. The same method is continued in the provision for the ratification of amendments, except that while the original provisions proposed by the conventions of 1787 required unanimous consent by all the States, amendments require the consent only of three-fourths. The question is still the same. Will the several States consent to a change in the grant of power to the General Government or in the terms of the grant? In giving or withholding that consent the smallest State in population counts for as much as the greatest. No account whatever is taken of the will of the majority of the people of the United States.

"It is manifest that this process, while perfectly adapted to the purpose of correcting errors in the Constitution of Government, was never intended to be applied and can not be applied to the making of laws for the people of the United States.

"The liberty of citizens of New Jersey within the territory of that State may be controlled by laws enacted directly or indirectly by a majority of the people of that State, or it may be controlled by laws enacted directly or indirectly by a majority of the people of the United States. The distribution of powers in the Constitution determines by which of the two majorities the power of control shall be exercised in every field of possible lawmaking. No construction of the Constitution is permissible which would deliver over the people of any State to the control of a law which is not the command either of a majority of the people of the State or of a majority of the people of the United States. Such an intention would be inconsistent with the essential principles of free self-government, and it can not be imputed to the makers of the Constitution. It can not exist in a government which we boast is a 'Government of the people, by the people, and for the people.'

"11. A construction of Article V which would give to the agents thereby authorized to amend the Constitution authority themselves to exercise the legislative power of government would be wholly inconsistent with the fundamental character of the National Government as a government of limited powers.

"If such a power as this exists, then there are three legislative authorities under the Constitution—first, the Congress legislating with the cooperation of the President within the scope of the enumerated powers; secondly, the State legislatures legislating in the several States throughout the field of their reserved powers; and, thirdly, three-fourths of the State legislatures legislating upon the proposal of Congress upon any and all subjects whatever. Inasmuch as the legislative acts of the last-mentioned body, if valid, are to be deemed amendments of the Constitution, they are subject to none of the limitations of the Constitution, according to the defendants. If this present legislation be valid, then the people of the United States in adopting the Constitution created an authority competent, without further reference to them, to pass ex post facto laws and bills of attainder, to impose direct taxes without enumeration, to levy duties on articles exported from any State, to make discriminating regulations of commerce, to grant titles of nobility, to prohibit the free exercise of religion, to deprive of life, liberty, and property without due process of law—all under color of amendment to the Constitution.

"While the first amendment provides that—

"'Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assembly, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances'—

"we must read instead that—

"'Congress shall make no law respecting the establishment of religion, etc., except with the consent of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States,'

"and three-fourths of the States, according to the estimated population of the United States in the year 1919, may contain much less than one-half of the population of the United States. The point is not that the Constitution may be amended to permit these things; it is that the power now exists to do these things without changing a word of the Constitution if the contention of the Government is now upheld.

"It is no answer to say that such abuses of power are not likely to happen and that all power is liable to abuse. The essential basis of every bill of rights is that abuses are likely to happen when fallible men are invested with the powers of government, and that they can be prevented only by express limitations of the power granted. Can it be supposed that in 1787, when every State was suspicious and jealous of possible combinations against it by other States, the people of any State intended that any governmental authority should have power to legislate without their consent in disregard of all those great limitations upon official power which they deemed so essential?

"The reason asserted by the men of Concord (supra) in 1776 against giving the legislature power to alter the Constitution applies to-day equally against giving ordinary legislative power to the governmental agency authorized to amend the Constitution, 'because a Constitution alterable by the Supreme Legislative is no security at all to the subject against the encroachment of the governing part on any or all their rights and privileges.'

"This is the most fundamental, vital, and essential separation of powers under the American system. The limitations of the Constitution do not merely protect the States and the National Government against encroachment by each other; they protect all individual citizens against all authority of government in violation of those rules which the people of the United States deem to be essential to their liberty, 'against the encroachment of the governing part on any or all their rights and privileges.' It was to make that protection certain that the demand for the first 10 amendments was so insistent and irresistible. The people of the United States intended that there should be no legislative power in government to override these great rules established for their protection.

"The people of practically every State represented in the convention of 1787 had limited their own governments in their own States, composed of men elected by themselves, by the great rules of the Bill of Rights for the protection of their individual liberties. (See the argument of George Mason in the Virginia convention, 3 Elliot's Debates, pp. 446–447.) Are we now to suppose that they intended to empower the governments of other States to pass laws affecting their liberties without restraint from any of those limitations?

"12. The power to change a rule imposing a limitation upon legislation is an entirely different thing from authority to disregard that rule while it remains unchanged. (State ex rel. v. Roach, 230 Mo., supra.)

"It is improbable that the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or of any considerable number of States, would consent to the abrogation of any of the great limitations of the Constitution, first, because every rule of limitation is supported by a variety of interests; and, secondly, because those rules are founded upon general considerations of justice and liberty and right conduct rather than upon the concrete and particular motives involved in a specific measure of legislation. The calendars of our courts are, however, crowded with cases involving attempts on the part of legislative bodies to avoid or evade limitations of the Constitution, which limitations those same bodies would not for a moment think of abrogating. The distinction between being governed by rules of right conduct and governed by the impulses of particular occasions is a vital characteristic of our constitutional system. Constitutional rules are made, principles of action are declared abstractly, dispassionately, free from the impulses and passions and warping influences of particular measures and particular times, in order that the impulses of the moment may not overcome the principles by which a right-minded people desire to be governed. The distinction was bred into the common thought and life of the people of the Colonies by their religion. To impute to the makers of the Constitution an intention to authorize any governmental agency whatever to adopt specific legislative measures in disregard of the general limitations prescribed, without any other change of the limitation than that resulting from the infraction of it, is to ignore the most vital part of the purpose which created a Government of limited powers.

"III.

"ARTICLE V OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES DOES NOT AUTHORIZE ANY AMENDMENT WHICH WOULD IMPAIR THE RESERVED POLICE OR GOVERNMENTAL POWERS OF THE SEVERAL STATES AND THEIR RIGHT TO LOCAL SELF-GOVERNMENT.

"Assuming, arguendo, that, nothwithstanding the previous arguments, the court shall hold that provisions essentially legislative in their nature and effect may be made the subject of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and thereby removed from the legislative power of the Congress and the several States, it is submitted that the so-called eighteenth amendment is, nevertheless, invalid because constituting an attempt to impair the reserved police or governmental power of the several States and their right to local self-government, and because any such amendment would be in conflict with implied limitations. As we have already seen above (see supra, where McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, 403, and Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 389, are cited), the Congress in proposing an amendment, and the several State legislatures in ratifying it, are acting solely as nominated agents of the people of the United States under a delegated power as the authorities appointed by the people to amend their Constitution 'whenever two-thirds of both Houses [of the Congress] shall deem it necessary.' But the language vesting in such agents power to propose and ratify 'amendments to this Constitution' should not be construed as conferring unlimited power to amend and destroy the fundamental basis of the Federal system or dual form of government thereby created.

"There can be no reasonable doubt that it was contemplated by the framers, and is implied in the Constitution itself, that the several States, then existing or thereafter to be created, should be sovereign and autonomous in their spheres of local self-government. Hence any amendment which impairs or tends directly to destroy the right and power of the several States to local self-government should be held void as in conflict with the intent and spirit and implied limitations of the Federal Constitution adopted by the people of the United States. To repeat Chief Justice Marshall's declaration in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 403):

"'No political dreamer was ever wild enough to think of breaking down the lines which separate the States, and of compounding the American people into one common mass.'

"Half a century later Chief Justice Chase reiterated the same conviction in Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700, 725), saying:

"'The perpetuity and indissolubility of the Union by no means implies the loss of distinct and individual existence, or of the right of self-government by the States. * * * We have already had occasion to remark at this term (in Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall., 71, 76) that "the people of each State compose a State, having its own government, and endowed with all the functions essential to separate and independent existence," and that "without the States in union, there could be no such political body as the United States." Not only, therefore, can there be no loss of separate and independent autonomy to the States, through their union under the Constitution, but it may be not unreasonably said that the preservation of the States, and the maintenance of their governments, are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National Government. The Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States.'

"And in the recent case of Hammer v. Dagenhart (247 U. S., 251, 275), Mr. Justice Day, speaking for the court, emphasized this fundamental constitutional principle in the following language:

"'The maintenance of the authority of the States over matters purely local is as essential to the preservation of our institutions as is the conservation of the supremacy of the Federal power in all matters intrusted to the Nation by the Federal Constitution.

"'In interpreting the Constitution it must never be forgotten that the Nation is made up of States to which are intrusted the powers of local government. And to them and to the people the powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved. (Lane County v. Oregon, 7 Wall., 71, 76.) The power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs by such laws as seem wise to the local authority is inherent and has never been surrendered to the General Government.' (See to the same effect, Gordon v. United States, 117 U. S., 697, 701, 705.)

"The validity of what is known as the eighteenth article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States is challenged upon the ground that it is not authorized by Article V of the Constitution, because it constitutes essentially a fundamental change in violation of the intent and spirit and implied limitations of the Constitution, and that, if enforceable, its provisions, and the reasoning upon which it would be upheld, would impair or tend to destroy the right of the States to local self-government and purposeful separate existence and overthrow the Federal principle upon which the Constitution was based.

"The point now suggested did not arise in connection with any other amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and, consequently, the precise question has not been considered or adjudicated, although controlling principles have been from time to time enunciated. As we have already seen, the prior amendments to the Federal Constitution were clearly, in their intrinsic nature, germane to provisions already contained in the Constitution and in harmony with the purpose and spirit of our system and dual form of government. The courts have therefore had no occasion to declare and define the limitations upon the power to amend the Constitution under Article V.

"The people of the United States who are, of course, the source of all constitutional and political power, may, by the same process which produced the present Constitution and terminated the government created and existing under the Articles of Confederation, make any alteration which they deem proper in their form or system of government. 'The people made the Constitution, and the people can unmake it.' (Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 389.) If fundamental changes become necessary, a convention may be called on the application of two-thirds of the States for that purpose. The Constitution does not limit the powers of the people of the United States. But it is plainly the measure of the powers of any agents appointed by the people thereunder. Indisputably 'a constitution is the measure of the rights delegated by the people to their governmental agents and not of the rights of the people.' (Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y., 459, 470.) In other words, the people themselves may rescind the 'social compact' (Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall., 386, 388) which is embodied in our Federal Constitution and enter into such new compact as they please. It does not, however, by any means follow that the same unrestrained power is vested in their governmental agents; that is, in two-thirds of the Houses of Congress and the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

"The powers of the people of the United States are limited only by that which they may see fit to agree upon; but the powers of the legislatures of some of the States to impose their will upon the people themselves and the other States, even though the latter be but a minority, must have some limitation. As this court declared in Loan Association v. Topeka (20 Wall., 655, 663), 'the theory of our governments * * * is opposed to the deposit of unlimited power anywhere.' It is, therefore, submitted that an amendment tending to impair or destroy the rights of the States to local self-government or to change fundamentally our Federal form of republican government, however carefully such an amendment might provide that the Senate should be duly preserved and the equal suffrage of the several States therein respected, could not be validly and legally made to come to pass against the objection and protest of any State.

"Manifestly, the Constitution of the United States, like every other written instrument, must in many respects depend for its true construction upon plain implications to be derived from its nature and terms, the historical circumstances surrounding its origin, and, above all, the fundamental purposes of its creation. (Calder v. Bull, 3 Dall., 386, 388; Veazie Bank v. Fenno, 8 Wall., 533, 541; The Collector v. Day, 11 Wall., 113, 127; Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655, 663; Downes v. Bidwell, 182 U. S., 244, 290–291; Murphy v. Ramsey, 114 U. S., 15, 44; Rathbone v. Wirth, 150 N. Y., 459, 483–484; Matter of Fraser v. Brown, 203 N. Y., 136, 143.) And equally plainly these implications must affect and modify each of its terms and provisions, including the amending power granted in Article V. Nothing can, consequently, be made a part of the Constitution by the process of mere amendment by act of governmental agents which is primarily and directly in conflict with its implied limitations or spirit and purposes, or subversive of the Federal form of government it intended permanently to establish. As Chief Justice Chase said in Veazie Bank v. Fenno, supra, in reference to the apparently unlimited power of taxation:

"'There are, indeed, certain virtual limitations arising from the principles of the Constitution itself. It would undoubtedly be an abuse of the power if so exercised as to impair the separate existence and independent self-government of the States, or if exercised for ends inconsistent with the limited grants of power in the Constitution.'

"In order to test the validity of any proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, its essential nature, its primary purpose, and its direct tendency must be analyzed and determined. The adoption and validation of any amendment is, of course, authority for the adoption and validity of all others of a similar nature and purpose and having the same tendency, wherever they may lead; for it is too well settled to require argument that the test of the validity of a power is, not how it is probable that it will be exercised in particular cases, but what can properly be done under it. (Keller v. United States, 213 U. S., 138, 148; Colon v. Lisk, 153 N. Y., 188, 194.) 'Questions of power do not depend on the degree to which it may be exercised' (Brown v. Maryland, 12 Wheat., 419, 439).

"With these propositions in mind, the terms of the so-called eighteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States should be considered. In section 1 it provides that—

"'The manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.'

"Quite indisputably this proposed amendment, if valid, would be self-executing (Civil Rights Cases, 109, U. S., 3, 20), and would withdraw from the several States all power and control over the manufacture, sale, and transportation in local or intrastate commerce of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes—a field heretofore exclusively within their absolute and independent control. (In re Rahrer, 140 U. S., 545, 554–5; Matter of Heff, 197 U. S., 488, 505; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 453–4; State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 181 Pac. 920, 922 (Wash.).) The plain object and purpose of the amendment are to destroy the police or governmental power of the several States in respect of a large and important subject matter, and to accomplish this substantial diminution of governmental power and local self-government not indirectly or as an incidental consequence of some due regulation or readjustment of the Federal powers bestowed in the original Constitution, but solely and primarily by a direct invasion of the reserved powers of the several States. (The provision for concurrent power in section 2 of the so-called eighteenth amendment does not change the essential nature of the amendment as an impairment of the police power of the several States. Section 1, of its own force, destroys pro tanto the police power of the States. Section 2 merely gives the States concurrent power to enforce the prohibitions of section 1, but confers upon them no power to alter or destroy those prohibitions. In respect of the latter, therefore, the governmental power of the States has been wiped out if the amendment be valid.)

"If this amendment be valid the principle which it embodies and the tendency which it establishes and legalizes would authorize the most far-reaching and revolutionary alterations in our governmental system. The right to manufacture, sell, and transport in local or intrastate commerce tobacco, condiments, coffee, grain, meat, cotton, or any other products, which three-fourths of the several States at any time deem objectionable, could then unquestionably be prohibited by constitutional amendment. The right of the States to establish and enforce social distinctions between the races and prevent their intermarriage, which a number of our States firmly believe vital to their peace, order, and happiness; the right of the States to regulate any other domestic relation; the right of the States to regulate strikes and lockouts; the right of the States to levy and collect their own taxes for their own purposes; the right of the States to forbid the use of child labor or regulate the hours of labor in the factories within their respective borders; the right of the States to enact employers' liability and workmen's compensation laws for the benefit of their inhabitants—in a word, the entire right of each of the States to regulate the life, conduct, and intrastate affairs and business of its citizens in accordance with its own needs and its own views may all be destroyed by the action of two-thirds of a quorum of both Houses of Congress and the concurrence of the three-fourths of the legislatures of the States, representing, it may be, a minority of the people of the United States.

"It is an inevitable conclusion that, if the so-called eighteenth amendment, which directly deprives the several States of a substantial portion of their respective police powers and revenues, be a constitutional exercise of power, then another amendment may constitutionally sweep away every remaining vestige of the police powers of the State, that is to say, 'the powers of government inherent in every sovereignty to the extent of its dominions, * * * the power to govern men and things within the limits of its dominions' (Taney, C. J., in the License Cases, 5 How., 504, 583. See also Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S., 104, 111; Sligh v. Kirkwood, 237 U. S., 52, 59; and Ives v. South Buffalo R. Co., 201 N. Y., 271, 300). (It is immaterial that different amendments suggested from time to time in the past may have resembled the so-called eighteenth amendment in being similar invasions of the police powers of the several States. They were never adopted, and hence could interfere with no right and call for no challenge in court.)

"The case at bar, therefore, resolves itself into this most serious inquiry: May two-thirds of the Houses of Congress and the legislatures of three-fourths of the States validly amend the Constitution of the United States so as to deprive every State of local self-government—that is, of its right to regulate the conduct and welfare of its own citizens? In disposing of this question it should be borne in mind that in many instances neither two-thirds of a quorum of the House of Congress nor three-fourths of the several States may represent even a majority of the people of the country (indeed, there are 12 States of the Union which contain a majority of the population of the country); and it is of equal moment to lay out of mind the fortuitous circumstance that this grave and vital question of constitutional law is presented to the court in a cause which happens to concern liquor.

"In considering this aspect of our contention, it should be distinctly borne in mind that the fundamental reason for the existence of separate, independent, and sovereign States is the power of internal police and local self-government with which they have always been clothed. (Sligh v. Kirkwood, 237 U. S., 52, 59; Patterson v. Kentucky, 97 U. S., 501, 503; Fertilizer Co. v. Hyde Park, id., 659, 667; License Cases, 5 How., 504, 583.) As Mr. Justice Woodbury pointedly remarked in the License Cases (5 How., at p. 628):

"'How can they—that is, the States—be sovereign within their respective spheres without power to regulate all their internal commerce as well as police?'

"The right of a State to have and exercise its police power is the very breath of its being, and without that power it would be a mere name, a mere geographic unit, an empty shell. (Ex parte Rowe, 59 South., 69, 70 (Ala.).) Every other power of a State is directly dependent for vigor and usefulness upon the police power. The right to lay taxes exists only in order to defray the cost involved in exercising the police power; the right to create courts and appoint officials only in order to furnish the necessary machinery for the exercise of that power and the enforcement of its sanctions. In essence, therefore, as in practical effect, the police power of a State is the State itself; with it the State is a potent, sovereign, autonomous, self-governing being; without it the State is nothing but a name. (Stone v. Mississippi, 101 U. S., 814, 819–820; N. Y. & N. E. R. R. Co. v. Bristol, 151 U. S., 556, 567; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 451; Atlantic Coast Line v. Goldsboro, 232 U. S. 548, 558; Hare on American Constitutional Law, Vol. II, p. 766.) As declared in the work last cited:

"'The police power may be justly said to be more general and pervading than any other. It embraces all the operations of society and government; all the constitutional provisions presuppose its existence, and none of them preclude its legitimate exercise. It is impliedly reserved in every public grant.'

"And Judge Cooley in his work on Constitutional Limitations (7th ed., pp. 243, 263) said:

"'The right of local self-government can not be taken away, because all our constitutions assume its continuance as the undoubted right of the people and as inseparable incident to republican government, * * * one which almost seems a part of the very nature of the race to which we belong.'

"There is much familiar historical matter that shows most convincingly the purpose of the framers of the Constitution and the original States which adopted it to establish an indestructible Union composed of indestructible States and a National Government of enumerated and limited powers, together with a series of State governments, sovereign and independent in the spheres of power not delegated to or vested in the Nation, and endowed with the same perpetuity which the Articles of Confederation had asserted for the central Government. Equally clear is the fact that the founders of our form of government intended that it should ever be a true Federal system, constituting a Union of free and independent States, each possessed of distinct and substantial autonomous and self-governing power as to its own people and its own local government and not a single, consolidated, centralized government in which the several States were to be but forms of municipal corporations of the central Government, or less—mere geographical divisions. (The following are but a few illustrations of the manner in which the States were regarded by the leading statesmen who shared in the delicate task of effecting the ratification of the Constitution by the several States: Hamilton in the New York convention, June 21, 1788 (Elliot's Debates, Vol. II, pp. 267–268): 'Were the laws of the Union to new model the internal police of any State, were they to alter or abrogate at a blow the whole of its civil and criminal institutions, were they to penetrate the recesses of domestic life and control in all respects the private conduct of individuals, there might be force in the objection [to the plan of the Constitution], and the same Constitution, which was happily calculated for one State might sacrifice the welfare of another. The blow aimed at the members must give a fatal wound to the head and the destruction of the States must be at once a political suicide. Can the National Government be guilty of this madness?' Oliver Wolcott in the Connecticut convention (Elliot's Debates, Vol. II, p. 202): 'The Constitution effectually secures the States in their several rights. It must secure them for its own sake, for they are the pillars which uphold the general system.' Pierce Butler to Weedon Butler, October 8, 1787 (Farrand's Records, Vol. III, p. 103): 'The powers of the General Government are so defined as not to destroy the sovereignty of the individual States.' Pelatiah Webster, often called 'the father of the Constitution,' in his pamphlet entitled 'The weakness of Brutus exposed' (Philadelphia, 1787): 'It appears, then, very plain that the natural effect and tendency of the supreme power of the Union is to give strength, establishment, and permanency to the internal police and jurisdiction of each of the particular States; not to melt down and destroy, but to support and confirm them all.' Jefferson to Madison, February 8, 1786: 'With respect to everything external, we be one Nation only, firmly hooked together. Internal government is what each State should keep to itself.'

Jefferson to William Johnson in 1823 (Ford's Writings of Jefferson, Vol. VII, p. 296): 'The capital and leading object of the Constitution was to leave with the States all authorities which respected their own citizens only and to transfer to the United States those which respected citizens of foreign or other States.' Jefferson's first inaugural address (Wayland, Political Opinions of Thomas Jefferson, p. 46): 'I deem as essential principles of our Government the support of the State governments in all their rights as the most competent administrations for our domestic concerns and the surest bulwarks against antirepublican tendencies; the preservation of the General Government in its whole constitutional vigor as the sheet anchor of our peace at home and safety abroad.' Jefferson to Cartwright, June 5, 1824 (id., pp. 42–46): 'They—that is, the State and Federal Governments—are coordinate departments of one simple, integral whole. To the State governments are reserved all legislation and administration in affairs which concern their citizens only, and to the Federal Government is given whatever concerns foreigners or the citizens of other States, these functions alone being Federal. The one is the domestic, the other the foreign, branch of the same Government, neither having control over the other, but within its own department.' (See to the same effect the Congressional Globe, 38th Cong., 1st sess., p. 2993.) Jefferson to Johnson, January 26, 1811 (Wayland, id.): 'The true barriers of our liberties in this country are our State governments. * * * Seventeen distinct States amalgamated into one as to their foreign concerns, but single and independent as to their internal administration.' Sherman and Ellsworth to the governor of Connecticut, September 26, 1797 (Farrand Records, Vol. III, p. 99): 'Some additional powers are vested in Congress. * * * These powers extend only to matters respecting the common interests of the Union and are specifically defined so that the particular States retain their sovereignty in all other matters.' Marshall, C. J., in Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1, 195): 'The genius and character of the whole Government seem to be that its action is to be applied to all the external concerns of the Nation and to those internal concerns which affect the States generally, but not to those which are completely within a particular State which do not affect other States and with which it is not necessary to interfere for the purpose of executing some of the general powers of the Government.' Article 1, section 1, of the constitution of Texas, adopted 1876: 'Texas is a free and independent State, subject only to the Constitution of the United States, and the maintenance of our free institutions and the perpetuity of the Union depend upon the preservation of the right of local self-government unimpaired to all the States.' (See also Art. II, sec. 3, of the Constitution of Missouri to the same effect. See also Freund on Police Power, secs. 54 and 68; Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., pp. 65, 243, 261, 263; House v. Mayes, 219 U. "Chief Justice Marshall, who was a member of the constitutional convention of the State of Virginia and who participated in a large part of the anxious and difficult labor which led to its adoption therein, has left a clear and emphatic record upon this score. In Dartmouth College v. Woodward (4 Wheat. 518, 629), he declared:

"'That the framers of the Constitution did not intend to restrain the States in the regulation of their civil institutions, adopted for internal government, and that the instrument they have given us is not to be so construed, may be admitted.'

"Similar doctrine has been announced in a long line of decisions. In Lane County v. Oregon (7 Wall., 71, 76) Chief Justice Chase said:

"'Without the States in union there could be no such political body as the United States. * * * In many articles of the Constitution the necessary existence of the States, and, within their proper spheres, the independent authority of the States, is distinctly recognized. To them nearly the whole charge of interior regulation is committed or left; to them and to the people all powers not expressly delegated to the National Government are reserved.'

"But who can in reason assert that a State has a 'necessary existence' or any 'independent authority' under the Constitution, if the provisions of Article V permit its governmental powers to be reduced to a mere shadow and its authority over local self-government to nothing substantial? Is the existence of any State 'necessary' or its authority in the least 'independent,' when both subsist but at the sufferance of two-thirds of the Houses of Congress and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States? Can it be doubted that the Constitution would have been rejected if it had been seriously suggested in the State conventions which adopted it that Article V granted unlimited amending power and thus placed the minority of the States in peril of virtual extinction through deprivation of all their substantial powers? No one familiar with our history can for a moment believe that any of the States would have been party to such an agreement. On the contrary, they regarded the amending clause as authorizing merely correctional matters germane to the original instrument. John Marshall in the Virginia constitutional convention said (3 Elliot's Debates, p. 234): 'The difficulty we find in amending the Confederation will not be found in amending this Constitution. Any amendments, in the system before you, will not go to a radical change; a plain way is pointed out for the purpose.' Amendments to the Articles of Confederation had to be by unanimous consent of the State legislatures (art. 13), but, as under the Constitution, amendments were possible by the action of fewer than all, it is clear that they could not properly be 'radical changes.' They had, therefore, necessarily to be in harmony with, to be germane to, and 'within the lines of, the original instrument'; otherwise they were not properly amendments at all. (Livermore v. Waite, 102 Calif., 113, 118–119. See also Gagnon v. United States, 193 U. S., 451, 457. And if the so-called eighteenth amendment would have been regarded as repugnant to the Constitution when the Constitution was adopted—which it is submitted can not be doubted—it is so now, for the meaning and effect of the Constitution must at all times be the same. (Ex parte Bain, 121 U. S., 1, 12; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 448; Story on the Constitution, sec. 1908.)

"It is impossible to reconcile with the decision of this court in Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700, 725), quoted above, the contention that the amending power contained in Article V of the Constitution is unlimited and may be exercised by some of the States, so as to take part or all of the police or governmental powers of an objecting State against its will. If that were true, if the so-called eighteenth amendment were valid, then, notwithstanding the solemn pronouncement of this court to the contrary in Texas v. White, the States by entering into the Union under the Constitution might suffer 'the loss of distinct and individual existence,' of 'the right of self-government,' and of their 'separate and independent autonomy,' and it can no longer be asserted, as Chief Justice Chase solemnly declared, that 'the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are as much within the design and care of the Constitution as the preservation of the Union and the maintenance of the National Government,' since, under the theory of the defendants, the Constitution, in Article V, carries within itself the power to accomplish the virtual annihilation of the States and their debasement to impotent and all but meaningless geographic designations. The several States could then be constitutionally transmuted into mere municipal corporations of the central Government, or even into less, and the 'indestructible States,' which the court declared that 'the Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to' could be practically destroyed as effective governments under 'color of amendment.' How can it be said that 'the Constitution, in all its provisions, looks to * * * indestructible States,' when, if the defendants be right, one of those very provisions—namely, Article V—at all times had and has within itself the power to compass their practical destruction?

"A determined attempt was made in the Slaughter House Cases (16 Wall., 36, 77) to secure the approval of this court of an effort to impair the police power of the States under the pretext that that result necessarily followed from the terms and provisions of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution, but the contentions to that effect were most emphatically repudiated by Mr. Justice Miller, speaking for the court, who said:

"'Was it the purpose of the fourteenth amendment, by the simple declaration that no State should make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States, to transfer the security and protection of all the civil rights which we have mentioned, from the States to the Federal Government? And where it is declared that Congress shall have the power to enforce that article, was it intended to bring within the power of Congress the entire domain of civil rights heretofore belonging exclusively to the States?

"'All this and more must follow if the proposition of the plaintiffs in error be sound. For not only are these rights subject to the control of Congress whenever in its discretion any of them are supposed to be abridged by State legislation, but that body may also pass laws in advance, limiting and restricting the exercise of legislative power by the States, in their most ordinary and usual functions, as in its judgment it may think proper on all such subjects. * * * The argument we admit is not always the most conclusive which is drawn from the consequences urged against the adoption of a particular construction of an instrument. But when, as in the case before us, these consequences are so serious, so far-reaching and pervading, so great a departure from the structure and spirit of our institutions; when the effect is to fetter and degrade the State governments by subjecting them to the control of Congress, in the exercise of powers heretofore universally conceded to them of the most ordinary and fundamental character; when, in fact, it radically changes the whole theory of the relations of the State and Federal Governments to each other and of both these governments to the people, the argument has a force that is irresistible, in the absence of language which expresses such a purpose too clearly to admit of doubt.

"'We are convinced that no such results were intended by the Congress which proposed these amendments, nor by the legislatures of the States which ratified them.'

"See also the reasoning of Mr. Justice Bradley in the Civil Rights cases (109 U. S., 3, 11–15, 19.)

"In Northern Securities Co. v. United States (193 U. S., 197, 348), Mr. Justice Harlan, referring to the declarations of Chief Justice Chase in Texas against White, quoted above, said:

"'These doctrines are at the basis of our constitutional Government and can not be disregarded with safety.'

"And the present learned Chief Justice, on behalf of the dissenting justices, also called attention to—

"'The powers of the Federal and State Governments, the general nature of the one and the local character of the other, which it was the purpose of the Constitution to create and perpetuate' (id., p. 369).

"It is manifest, however, that if the views of the defendants be now accepted as sound and controlling, these essential underlying doctrines must be at last disregarded and that the Constitution has in fact failed in its purpose to perpetuate the powers of the States over matters of local self-government. In other words, so far as concerns one of its most clearly revealed purposes and intentions, the Constitution has proved a self-destructive instrument, because within Article V lies hidden the means of subverting the most fundamental characteristics of the system of government established by the Constitution.

"In Keller v. United States (213 U. S., 138, 148–149), the court held unconstitutional an act of Congress which, under the guise of a regulation of interstate commerce, attempted to interfere with the internal affairs of the States, and Mr. Justice Brewer, speaking for the court, used the following language:

"'If the contention of the Government be sound, whatever may have been done in the past, however little this field of legislation may have been entered upon, the power of Congress is broad enough to take cognizance of all dealings of citizens with aliens. That there is a moral consideration in the special facts of this case, that the act charged is within the scope of the police power, is immaterial, for, as stated, there is in the Constitution no grant to Congress of the police power. And the legislation must stand or fall according to the determination of the question of the power of Congress to control generally dealings of citizens with aliens. In other words, an immense body of legislation, which heretofore has been recognized as peculiarly within the jurisdiction of the States, may be taken by Congress away from them. Although Congress has not largely entered into this field of legislation, it may do so if it has the power. Then we should be brought face to face with such a change in the internal conditions of this country as was never dreamed of by the framers of the Constitution. While the acts of Congress are to be liberally construed in order to enable it to carry into effect the powers conferred, it is equally true that prohibitions and limitations upon those powers should also be fairly and reasonably enforced. (Fairbank v. United States, 181 U. S., 283.) To exaggerate in the one direction and restrict in the other will tend to substitute one consolidated government for the present Federal system. We should never forget the declaration in Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700, 725), that "the Constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States."'

"(See likewise Hammer v. Dagenhart, 247 U. S., 251, 275, cited and quoted from above at pp. 66–67.)

"It will be observed that in both of these cases the indestructibility of the several States, which is implied in the Constitution, and, indeed, their indestructibility, not as mere geographic units, but as actual, autonomous, locally self-governing sovereignties, was deemed determinative for the purpose of restricting the clause of the Constitution granting to the Federal Government without any express limitation the right to regulate and control interstate commerce. Why, then, is not the same implication effectual to limit and qualify another part of the same Constitution, namely, the amending clause contained in Article V? Certainly it would be vain to urge, as does the court in the Hammer case (247 U. S., at p. 275), that 'the maintenance of the authority of the States over matters purely local is * * * essential to the preservation of our institutions' and 'the power of the States to regulate their purely internal affairs * * * inherent and * * * never surrendered to the General Government' if the States held that authority only temporarily and could be deprived of all of it whenever two-thirds of the Houses of Congress and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States saw fit to take advantage of the power conferred in Article V of the Constitution. (See also Kentucky v. Dennison, 24 How., 66, 107; Guinn v. United States, 238 U. S., 347, 362.)

"The right of the States to continue as effective local governments which is implied in the Constitution has been emphatically recognized and enforced as against an express and practically unqualified power sought to be exercised in conflict therewith in the cases which hold that it is unconstitutional for the Federal Government to attempt to tax the several States or their governmental instrumentalities. (The Collector v. Day, 11 Wall., 113, 124, 125, 127; United States v. Railroad Co., 17 Wall., 322, 327; Pollock v. Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., 157 U. S., 429, 584; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 453.) The ratio decidendi of these authorities is not based upon any express limitation upon the Federal taxing power, for the grant of power is unlimited, but solely upon the 'necessary implication' which arises out of our dual and Federal system of government and 'the great law of self-preservation,' which the States are entitled to invoke against efforts tending to bring about their ultimate destruction. As Mr. Justice Nelson said in The Collector v. Day, supra:

"'The General Government and the States, although both exist within the same territorial limits, are separate and distinct sovereignties, acting separately and independently of each other, within their respective spheres. * * * Such being the separate and independent condition of the States in our complex system, as recognized by the Constitution, and the existence of which is so indispensable, that, without them, the General Government itself would disappear from the family of nations, it would seem to follow, as a reasonable if not a necessary consequence, that the means and instrumentalities employed for carrying on the operations of their governments, for preserving their existence, and fulfilling the high and responsible duties assigned to them in the Constitution, should be left free and unimpaired, should not be liable to be crippled, much less defeated by the taxing power of another government. * * *

"'If the means and instrumentalities employed by that government to carry into operation the powers granted to it are, necessarily, and, for the sake of self-preservation, exempt from taxation by the States, why are not those of the States depending upon their reserved powers, for like reasons, equally exempt from Federal taxation? Their unimpaired existence in the one case is as essential as in the other. It is admitted that there is no express provision in the Constitution that prohibits the General Government from taxing the means and instrumentalities of the States, nor is there any prohibiting the States from taxing the means and instrumentalities of that Government. In both cases the exemption rests upon necessary implication, and is upheld by the great law of self-preservation; as any government, whose means employed in conducting its operations, if subject to the control of another and distinct government, can exist only at the mercy of that government.'

"If, however, Article V of the Constitution authorizes amendments directly withdrawing police powers from the States, which their necessarily implied right of self-preservation may, nevertheless, not resist, it would be baseless to argue, as did the court in The Collector v. Day, that the existence of the States is indispensable under our constitutional system, for the States then would have their being 'only at the mercy of' the Congress and the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

"Certainly until the present controversy arose no jurist or statesman would have conceived it possible that under our Government the several States of the Union constituted destructible sovereignties. Even during all the bitterness and high feeling preceding the Civil War, the independent sovereignty and indestructibility of the States were not challenged. In 1860 the Republican national convention which nominated Lincoln wrote the following declaration into its platform (Congressional Globe, 38th Cong., 1st sess., p. 2985):

"'Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the State, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to that balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depends.'

"And in his first inaugural address President Lincoln, referring to this declaration, said:

"'I now reiterate these sentiments. * * * I understand a proposed amendment to the Constitution has passed Congress to the effect that the Federal Government shall never interfere with the domestic institutions of the States, including that of persons held to service. * * * Holding such a provision to now be implied constitutional law, I have no objection to its being made express and irrevocable.'

"The preservation of the State governments was one of the chief concerns of the framers of the Constitution. In numerous instances during the debates in the various constitutional conventions this clearly appears. The following extracts from Elliot's Debates (vol. 2, pp. 304, 309; vol. 4, pp. 53, 58) illustrate the spirit of the conventions:

"'Mr. HAMILTON. The State governments are essentially necessary to the form and spirit of the general system. As long, therefore, as Congress have a full conviction of this necessity, they must, even upon principles purely national, have as firm an attachment to the one as to the other. This conviction can never leave them, unless they become madmen. While the Constitution continues to be read, its principles known, the States must, by every rational man, be considered as essential, component parts of the Union; and therefore the idea of sacrificing the former to the latter is wholly inadmissible. * * * The gentlemen are afraid that the State governments will be abolished. But, sir, their existence does not depend upon the laws of the United States. Congress can no more abolish the State governments than they can dissolve the Union. The whole Constitution is repugnant to it.

"'Mr. IREDELL. I heartily agree with the gentleman that if anything in this Constitution tended to annihilation of the State government, instead of exciting the admiration of any man, it ought to excite the resentment and execration. No such wicked intention ought to be suffered. But the gentlemen who formed the Constitution had no such object; nor do I think there is the least ground for that jealousy. The very existence of the General Government depends on that of the State governments.

"'Mr. DAVIE. Mr. Chairman, a consolidation of the States is said by some gentlemen to have been intended. * * * If there were any seeds in this Constitution which might, one day, produce a consolidation, it would, sir, with me, be an insuperable objection. I am so perfectly convinced that so extensive a country as this can never be managed by one consolidated government. The Federal Convention were as well convinced as the Members of this House that the State governments were absolutely necessary to the existence of the Federal Government.'

"Under the contention of the defendants, however, Article V of the Constitution does contain not only the 'seeds,' but the plain means to 'produce a consolidation,' the very outcome which all those responsible for the instrument so strongly denounced as impossible and not intended.

"A scholarly and exceptionally competent historian, George Ticknor Curtis, treating of this subject in his work on the Constitutional History of the United States (Vol. II, pp. 160, 161), expressed himself as follows:

"'The ninth and tenth amendments are in themselves express fundamental provisions, fixing immutably the reserved rights of the States. If three-fourths of the States were to undertake to repeal them or to remove them from their place in the foundations of the Union, it would be equivalent to a revolution. There would remain nothing but the dominant force of the three-fourths of the States, and this would soon end in a complete consolidation of the physical force of the Nation, to be followed by a different system of government of a despotic character.

"'It seems to me, therefore, that while it is within the amending power to change the framework of government in some respects, it is not within that power to deprive any State, without its own consent, of any rights of self-government which it did not cede to the United States by the Constitution or which the Constitution did not prohibit it from exercising.'

"It should, moreover, be remembered that the issue now before the court embraces within itself a menace or portend of mischief even more far-reaching than that which is involved in the attack upon the present right of local self-government of the States—the same principle which would uphold the amendment in suit is fraught with menace to the existence of the Federal Government itself. If the power to amend contained in Article V of the Constitution is unlimited, it would support an amendment practically destroying the Federal principle or empowering the States to tax the instrumentalities of the Federal Government, or an amendment to deprive the Congress of essential legislative powers, which might involve the practical extinction of the 'perpetual' and 'more perfect Union' which the people erected! It is inconceivable that both the Nation and the States may to all practical intents have their fundamental characters changed or destroyed whenever it pleases two-thirds of the Houses of Congress and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States, which latter may readily represent only a minority of all the people of the United States. The possibility of any such outcome should condemn any rule that would permit it.

"It is submitted that the establishment and recognition in the Constitution of the two Governments, Federal and State, plainly implies that neither shall be permitted to destroy the other, and that the State power shall not be exerted to overthrow the Federal Government, nor the Federal power to impair the existence of the States. (In his lectures on the Constitution of the United States, Mr. Justice Miller said (pp. 24, 412): 'While the pendulum of public opinion has swung with much force away from the extreme point of State rights doctrine, there may be danger of its reaching an extreme point on the other side. In my opinion, the just and equal observance of the rights of the States and of the General Government, as defined by the present Constitution, is as necessary to the permanent prosperity of our country and to its existence for another century as it has been for the one whose close we are now celebrating. * * * The necessity of the great powers conceded by the Constitution originally to the Federal Government, and the equal necessity of the autonomy of the States and their power to regulate their domestic affairs, remain as the great features of our complex Government.') (South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 451, 452.) That, consequently, the States must be preserved, not as mere electoral and administrative districts of a unified and consolidated National Government, but as true local, self-governing sovereignties, inviolate and indestructible members of a dual, and not a consolidated, system of government, and with a permanent and effectual reason for being, namely, the possession of the power and the right to exercise forever the functions of internal, local self-government.

"It is no answer to these contentions to urge that the consequences of destruction herein referred to are not reasonably to be apprehended; that the various governmental authorities must have confidence in each other; and that such mutual confidence will tend to bring about governmental harmony. If we indulge in any such idea, we shall be merely shutting our eyes to ordinary human motives and weaknesses and forget that the struggle for power is the natural law of existence. If once it be decreed that the reserved power of the States may be invaded and that how far the invasion shall proceed is merely a question of policy and discretion, the struggle will never end until the States have been stripped of the last vestige of their substantial powers of local self-government. Usurpation always commences with loud and plausible protestations of good intentions and large promises of moderation and assertions that the encroachment will be limited and go no further. This line of argument, however, was long ago refuted by Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat., 316, 327, 431). It was there also argued that unlimited hostile power on the part of the States need not be apprehended if the several States and the Nation would only have "confidence" in each other. But Chief Justice Marshall rejected the contention, saying:

"'But is this a case of confidence? Would the people of any one State trust those of another with a power to control the most insignificant operations of their State government? We know they would not. Why, then, should we suppose that the people of any one State should be willing to trust those of another with a power to control the operations of a government to which they have confided their most important and most valuable interests? * * * This, then, is not a case of confidence, and we must consider it as it really is.'

"Perusal of the Constitution itself will show that, as Chief Justice Chase declared in Texas v. White, supra (7 Wall., 700, 725), 'The Constitution in all its provisions looks to an indestructible Union, composed of indestructible States.' Every article contains at least one provision specifying some attribute of independent sovereignty as belonging to the several States.

"Section 2 of Article I contemplates an elective State legislature; section 4, a State legislature capable of regulating elections; section 8, a State militia with officers appointed by State authorities, and a State legislature empowered to consent to the sale of State lands to the Federal Government; section 9, a State government with discretion over the migration and importation of persons, and section 10, a State government which, but for the prohibitions in that section, would have power to make treaties, wage war, enact every species of legislation, and lay every conceivable kind of tax. Section 1 of Article II looks to a State and a State legislature able to appoint presidential electors, and section 2 refers to the 'militia of the several States.' Article III deals with States capable of having controversies with each other and with third parties, of such a nature as to require judicial action, and also deals with States capable of having citizens of their own. Section 1 of Article IV has in view States having public acts, records, and judicial proceedings; section 2, States with systems of criminal justice, laws regulating the rights of persons, executive authorities and citizens possessed of privileges and immunities derived from their respective States; section 3, new States to be taken into 'this Union' in the future, and section 4, States having and maintaining under 'this Union a republican form of government,' with legislative and executive authorities charged with the duty of preserving order and safety within the States. Article VI speaks of State judges administering the law 'in every State,' and of legislative, judicial, and executive State officers.

"The second amendment refers to the militia of a free State; the tenth, to States with reserved powers; the eleventh, to States so sovereign that individuals may not even sue them without their consent; the fourteenth, to citizens of the States, to elective and appointive State officers of every kind and State debts and State moneys; the fifteenth, to the right to vote within the States, and the seventeenth, to elective State legislatures and to executive authority in such States.

"In Article V of the Constitution, State legislatures are specifically referred to as part of the machinery or agencies expressly erected by the Constitution for its amendment. But if the police power can be entirely withdrawn from the States by constitutional amendment, they will thereafter need no legislatures at all, since they may then no longer have anything to legislate about; and the machinery intended by the Constitution to be forever available for amending it might in that event no longer exist, and the Constitution thus thereafter cease to be amendable. The form may then remain but the substance will have vanished.

"Again, Article V in its proviso 'that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate,' necessarily implies and requires the continued existence of the States, for otherwise their equal suffrage in the Senate could be destroyed with them; and further implies that the States shall at all times exist as bodies capable of consenting—in other words, as autonomous, self-governing sovereignties. The same views are expressed as follows in Tucker's work on the Constitution of the United States (Vol. I, pp. 323–324):

"'The provision which fixed irrevocably the equipollency of each State in the Senate, unless such State surrenders it by its separate consent, is clear evidence that no change in this respect can be made but by a new compact, to which each State, as a distinct factor, must be a party. It proves the continuing and perpetual independence of the State as a primordial political particle, in order to its own protection against the vox majoritatis, whether of population or of States. It proves more. If the State was not to be preserved as an equal in sovereignty, despite a difference in population, there is no assignable reason for thus shielding its equality in the Senate against all action but at its own will and at its own consent. * * *

"'From this review it is obvious that, without the continuing existence of States and State governments de jure and de facto, the Federal Government itself would cease to be. * * *

"'If the States in their full autonomy as independent bodies politic are pulled down the Federal Samson would be destroyed amid their ruins.'

"It is no answer to these contentions to urge that the tenth amendment, which expressly reserves the police powers to the States, is after all but an amendment and as such may be altered like any other provision or amendment. The tenth amendment stands upon its own peculiar ground. It is, in fact, but the expression of matters implied in the original Constitution, and it added no power to the States and subtracted none from the Federal Government. (United States v. Cruikshank, 92 U. S., 542, 552; Wilkinson v. Leland, 2 Pet., 627, 657; Loan Association v. Topeka, 20 Wall., 655, 662–3.) If it did not exist the contentions herein urged would, nevertheless, have the same force and effect, and its amendability is, therefore, to be determined not by the mere fact that it is termed an amendment but by its intrinsic nature. In other words, if the principle which one of the first 10 amendments announces is of the very essence of free republican government or of our dual form of government to such an extent that changing it would be subverting our governmental system, then it is not a proper subject of amendment by means of the agencies provided in Article V of the Constitution. (State v. Keith, 63 N. Car., 140, 144; Eason v. State, 11 Ark., 481, 491.) Thus, the provision guaranteeing due process of law is plainly so vital to free government that it may not be destroyed, but the provision against self-incrimination or indictment by a grand jury may well be regarded as standing on a different footing.

"The guaranty rendered express by the tenth amendment is of vital obligation and was necessarily recognized and approved by every State when it entered into the Union, which can only remain a true Federal union so long as the several States retain the powers which that amendment expressly reserves. With the subject matter of that amendment substantially altered or destroyed, 'we may remain a free people, but the Union will not be the Union of the Constitution.' (Coyle v. Oklahoma, 221 U. S., 559, 580.)

"It has been suggested that the proceedings in the Federal Constitutional Convention of 1787 afford support for the defendants' construction of Article V of the Constitution (see Madison's Notes, Farrand, vol. 2, pp. 629–631), but investigation will dispel whatever doubt these proceedings may tend to create. It is reported that (id.)—

"'Mr. Sherman expressed his fears that three-fourths of the States might be brought to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether or depriving them of their equality in the Senate. He thought it reasonable that the proviso [in the amending clause of the proposed Constitution] in favor of the States importing slaves should be extended so as to provide that no State should be affected in its internal police or deprived of its equality in the Senate. * * *

"'Mr. Sherman moved, according to his idea above expressed, to annex to the end of the article a further proviso "that no State shall without its consent be affected in its internal police or deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate."

"'Mr. MADISON. Begin with these special provisos, and every State will insist on them for their boundaries, exports, etc.'

"And thereupon the phrase concerning the internal police of the States was omitted, while the phrase concerning the equal suffrage of the States in the Senate was retained.

"Of course, if the latter provision had been stricken out the equality of the States in the Senate could have been changed whenever two-thirds of the Houses of Congress and three-fourths of the legislatures of the States so desired, because such an equality is not indispensable to a free or republican or federal form of government any more than is equality of representation in the House of Representatives. If Senators were apportioned to the States as are Representatives, neither the essence nor spirit nor the fundamental principles of our Government would be affected. To preserve equality in the Senate, therefore, it was absolutely necessary that the amending clause of the Constitution should be expressly qualified to that effect.

"But the police powers of the States, their right to exist and to be immune from the efforts of some of the other States 'to do things fatal to particular States, as abolishing them altogether,' were clearly implied in the Constitution, as Chief Justice Chase declared in Texas v. White (7 Wall., 700, 725). The power of amendment was plainly understood not to apply to them. It was, therefore, quite unnecessary to write these fundamental implications into Article V. As Madison pointed out, if once that course had been entered upon every implication would have had to be counteracted and set out in express terms in the article, and no useful purpose be served, but, on the contrary, the large risk would have been incurred of omitting some that were important. That was what he meant, and all that he meant, when he declared—

"'Begin with these special provisos, and every State will insist on them, for their boundaries, exports, etc.'

"It is reasonably certain that the Constitution would never have been adopted if any responsible member of the Federal Convention had so much as intimated that Article V was intended to authorize the debasement and ultimate destruction of the States at the will of some of them only. Consequently, even if Madison, at the secret sessions of the Federal Convention, had entertained ideas to the contrary, that would be immaterial. The people acted upon the plain meaning of the instrument, and intended no such result as is urged by the defendants in the case at bar; and as the people reasonably read the Constitution, so should it be enforced. (Cooley on Constitutional Limitations, 7th ed., pp. 101–102; Maxwell v. Dow, 176 U. S., 581, 601–602; State v. St. Louis & S. W. Ry. Co., 197 S. W., 1012, 1013 (Tex.); Alexander v. People, 7 Colo., 155, 167.)

"It is, however, perfectly clear that Madison himself believed that the sovereignty of the States was fully protected by the implications apparent upon the face of the Constitution—indeed, that it was inviolable. In No. 43 of the Federalist, which has long been attributed to him, he wrote the following concerning the amending clause of the Constitution (Ford's ed., pp. 291–292):

"'The exception in favor of the equality of suffrage in the Senate was probably meant as a palladium to the residuary sovereignty of the States, implied and secured by that principle of representation in one branch of the legislature.'

"And in the thirty-ninth number of the Federalist Madison again described the States under the Constitution (before there was any tenth amendment), as follows (id., p. 251):

"'Its jurisdiction—that is, that of the Federal Government—extends to certain enumerated objects only, and leaves to the several States a residuary and inviolable sovereignty over all other objects.'

"IV.

"THE SO-CALLED EIGHTEENTH AMENDMENT HAS NOT BEEN RATIFIED BY THREE-FOURTHS OF THE SEVERAL STATES.

"Article V of the Constitution provides that proposed amendments thereto 'shall be valid to all intents and purposes * * * when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress.'

"Congress directed that the so-called eighteenth amendment proposed by it should be ratified by the action of the legislatures of the States, not only providing to that effect in the proposing resolution but expressly declaring in section 3 of the so-called amendment itself that it should be inoperative unless 'ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution,' within seven years. We are not, therefore, concerned with any question of ratification by conventions in the States, but solely with the validity of the alleged ratification of the proposed amendment by the legislatures of the several States.

"Three States—New Jersey, Rhode Island, and Connecticut—have not ratified the amendment. In the remaining States the legislative assemblies, called by various names, have given their approval to the amendment. In 19 of these States, however, the people in their respective State constitutions (the following are references to the apposite constitutional provisions in those States: South Dakota, art. 3, sec. 1, p. 1256; Oregon, art. 4, secs. 1 and 1a, p. 1154; Nevada, art. 19, secs. 1, 2, and 3, p. 899; Montana, art. 5, sec. 1, p. 819; Oklahoma, art. 5, secs. 1–8, p. 1097; Maine, art. 31, secs. 1, 16–20, p. 607; Missouri, art. 4, sec. 57, p. 785; Michigan, art. 5, sec. 1, p. 688; Arkansas, art. 5, sec. 1, p. 93; Colorado, art. 5, sec. 1, p. 195; Arizona, art. 4, sec. 1, p. 58; California, art. 4, sec. 1, p. 123; Ohio, art. 2, secs. 1–1g, p. 1060; Nebraska, art. 3, secs. 1–1d, p. 850; Washington, art. 2, sec. 1, p. 1443; North Dakota, art. 2, sec. 25, p. 1022; Mississippi, art. 4, sec. 33, Hemingway's Annotated Code, 1917, p. 151; Utah, art. 6, sec. 1, p. 1355; Massachusetts, art. 48, subd. 1, of amendments. The constitutions of Maryland, art. 16, p. 652, and New Mexico, art. 4, sec. 1, p. 939, provide only for the referendum and not for the initiative. The argument under this point, however, applies to those States as well as to the others mentioned. The foregoing page references are to Kettleborough on 'State Constitutions,' unless otherwise indicated. The constitutional provisions above referred to will be found in Appendix II to this brief) have reserved to themselves the right to enact practically every kind of legislation—with some minor exceptions—upon their own initiative, and also an equally comprehensive right to require the reference to themselves of almost all the enactments of their several legislative assemblies for rejection or approval at the polls. That is to say, in each of these States the initiative and referendum have left the electors of the State in effectual possession of continuous and permanent lawmaking power, not merely equal, but superior, to that of the houses of the legislative assemblies themselves. It is plain, therefore, that in the jurisdictions where the initiative and referendum prevail—and, indeed, even in the jurisdictions where the referendum alone obtains—the electors of the State are in truth and effect a branch of the legislative power, endowed with at least as much authority as the official legislative assembly itself, and yet in none of these States has there been any attempt to submit the eighteenth amendment to the electors of the State, except in Ohio, where the proposed amendment has been rejected at the polls. (Proceedings looking to a referendum upon the so-called eighteenth amendment have been taken in 12 States, viz., Arkansas, California, Colorado, Maine, Michigan, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Ohio, and Oregon.)

"A typical illustration of the manner in which the legislative power of the State is apportioned in the jurisdictions above referred to is contained in the following extract from section 1 of article 5 of the constitution of Michigan:

"'The legislative power of the State of Michigan is vested in a senate and house of representatives; but the people reserve to themselves the power to propose legislative measures, resolutions, and laws; to enact or reject the same at the polls independently of the legislature; and to approve or reject at the polls any act passed by the legislature, except acts making appropriations for State institutions and to meet deficiencies in State funds. * * *

"'The second power reserved to the people is the referendum. No act passed by the legislature shall go into effect until 90 days after the final adjournment of the session of the legislature which passed such act, except such acts making appropriations and such acts immediately necessary for the preservation of the public peace, health, or safety, as have been given immediate effect by action of the legislature.

"'Upon presentation to the secretary of state within 90 days after the final adjournment of the legislature of a petition certified to as herein provided, as having been signed by qualified electors equal in number to 5 per cent of the total vote cast for all candidates for governor at the last election at which a governor was elected, asking that any act, section, or part of any act of the legislature be submitted to the electors for approval or rejection, the secretary of state, after canvassing such petition as above required, and [if] the same is found to be signed by the requisite number of electors, shall submit to the electors for approval or rejection such act or section or part of any act at the next succeeding general election; and no such act shall go into effect until and unless approved by a majority of the qualified electors voting thereon.

"'Any act submitted to the people by either initiative or referendum petition and approved by a majority of the votes cast thereon at any election shall take effect 10 days after the date of the official declaration of the vote by the secretary of state. No act initiated or adopted by the people shall be subject to the veto power of the governor.'

"In States having constitutional provisions substantially as above, the legislative power conferred upon and possessed by, the nominal State legislature is hardly more than tentative in character, and the electors of the State are in fact the legislature, or the only department thereof possessed of supreme and ultimate power. With inconsequential exceptions, no permanent legislation can have any force and effect in those States unless the electors thereof are willing to accept it or acquiesce in it, and practically nothing that has their approval can be kept off the statute books if they see fit to call into play their initiative power.

"There can be no doubt of the constitutionality of such a distribution of legislative power within a State. The Constitution does not prescribe any requirement for the internal structure of a State government other than that it shall be republican in form; and, under our system of government, the right to decide what is or is not a republican form of government is exclusively vested in the political branches of the National Government. (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 1; Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S., 118; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S., 219, 234.) Since Representatives and Senators from all the States in question have been duly received and seated in Congress and now constitute a part of it, it is patent that the legislative department of the National Government views those States as possessing republican forms of government; and since the executive department of the National Government is every day having dealings with them as duly constituted States, it must be equally apparent that that department of the Federal Government regards them as organized and functioning in accordance with the requirements of the Federal Constitution.

"So long as a republican form of government is maintained, it is obvious that it is immaterial to the Federal Government how the State arranges or distributes the machinery for its own local government. The right of a State to have whatever means or instrumentalities of local government it deems fit is, indeed, as clear as its right to enact measures of local self-government in accordance with its own peculiar wishes. Both of these powers are wholly reserved to the States in the tenth amendment. (State ex rel. Davis v. Hildebrant, 94 Ohio Stat. 154, 161–2, affirmed, 241 U. S. 565.) It is entirely competent—and it always has been—for a State to establish the commission form of government for itself and to vest in such commission all or any of the powers of government, or to provide for a legislature with one, two, three, or even more, houses or branches. It is the right of the people of a State to abolish the legislative assembly entirely and to enact all laws upon their own initiative; or to create a legislative assembly and require that the measures enacted by their representatives or agents shall only be tentatively laws and subject to final approval or rejection by the electorate at the polls. In such a case the electorate of the State is a part of the legislative power and of the legislature of the State in the truest sense, since it alone has general, supreme, and ultimate legislative power. In such a jurisdiction it would be impossible for the legislative assembly to enact a prohibition statute or to repeal one, if the electorate were opposed. The latter alone could say finally and conclusively whether such a condition should prevail in their State as the law.

"These considerations make it imperative to determine whether in referendum and initiative States the legislative assemblies can do an act which necessarily must fundamentally and permanently affect and alter the law and public policy prevailing therein, without any recourse to or respect for the will of the respective electorates. That an amendment to the Federal Constitution affects the law prevailing within the States is too plain to warrant discussion. Article VI of the Constitution itself declares that the Constitution 'shall be the supreme law of the land,' and that 'the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding,' and, in the case of such an amendment as the eighteenth amendment, which is in and of itself mere sumptuary legislation directly aimed at the regulation of the conduct of life by every individual in the country, that aspect of the matter is peculiarly clear. We are thus necessarily led to the inquiry, What is the meaning of the term 'legislatures' in Article V of the Constitution, which requires a proposed constitutional amendment to be 'ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States'?

"Of course, the Constitution being a written instrument, meaning does not alter, and the word 'legislatures' used therein must now bear the same interpretation that would have been placed thereon by the framers. (Dred Scott v. Sandford, 19 How., 393, 426; South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 448.) As, however, the Constitution was not made for a day but was intended to embrace within its provisions the entire duration of our national existence, however long that might be (Martin v. Hunter's Lessee, 1 Wheat., 304, 326; McCulloch v. Maryland, 4 Wheat., 316, 415; Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 387), it is manifest that, 'as changes come in social and political life it embraces in its grasp all new conditions which are within the scope of the powers in terms conferred' therein (South Carolina v. United States, 199 U. S., 437, 448), and that it would certainly not be permissible 'to read into the [Constitution] a nolumus mutare as against the law-making power' of a State. (Noble State Bank v. Haskell, 219 U. S., 104, 110.) Yet it is all but inevitable that such a consequence of rigid inadaptability to new conditions should follow, if it be true that the legislatures, which may lawfully act upon proposed constitutional amendments, are only the bicameral legislative assemblies of the States, as the defendants claim. For it is manifest that a State which had deemed it proper to abolish its legislative assembly in its own interest would then be wholly incapacitated from either adopting or rejecting a proposed constitutional amendment which Congress, in its discretion under Article V, had seen fit to direct should be ratified by the legislatures and not by conventions in the several States. An outcome which would leave it within the uncontrollable power of Congress to prevent any State possessed of a lawful and constitutional form of government from having a voice in the decision of what shall be the supreme law of the land is certainly to be deprecated and avoided if possible. That it is possible to avoid any such conclusion is self-evident, since it is only necessary to construe the word 'legislatures' in Article V as not limited exclusively to the formal legislative assemblies of the several States, but as intended to refer to the repository of legislative power therein, whatever that may be and however called, and all the parts thereof.

"Such a construction of the Constitution but carries out its primary intention and is not inconsistent with what the framers may be deemed to have had in contemplation. The word 'legislature' could not have signified a bicameral body to them. They must have known that a legislative assembly of but one house existed, or had shortly before existed, in Connecticut, Rhode Island, and Pennsylvania. (Connecticut did not adopt a constitution until 1818, when for the first time its legislative department became bicameral. At the time of the formulation of the Federal Constitution it was operating under a charter granted in 1662 by Charles II, which it had converted into a constitution by an act of its assembly in October, 1776. (Johnston's Connecticut, ch. 16; Thorpe, Vol. I, p. 531.) Rhode Island did not adopt a constitution until 1842. In 1787 the legislative power was in a single house. (Charter of Rhode Island and Providence Plantation, 1663; Thorpe, Vol. VI, pp. 3211, 3215.) The constitution of Pennsylvania was adopted in September, 1776, and section 2 of its 'plan or frame of government' provided for but a single legislative body. (Thorpe, Vol. V, pp. 3082–3084.) In fact, the New Jersey plan for a Federal constitution provided, according to Madison, for but a single legislative body. (Larned, Vol. V, pp. 3297–3298.) The framers certainly looked upon the people of the States as the source of all governmental power in the several States and upon the legislative assemblies as merely their creatures or agents. (Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 389.) Indeed, most of the State constitutions of that day were explicit upon that score. (See, for example, Bill of Rights adopted by members of the Virginia House of Burgesses in 1776, sec. 2; constitution of Massachusetts, adopted 1780, arts. 4 and 5 (Thorpe, Vol. III, p. 1890); constitution of New Hampshire, effective 1784, arts. 7 and 8 (Thorpe, Vol. IV, p. 2454); constitution of New York, adopted 1777, art. 1 (Thorpe, Vol. V, p. 2628); constitution of Pennsylvania, adopted 1776, arts. 4 and 14 (Thorpe, Vol. V, pp. 3082–3084); constitution of Maryland, adopted 1776, arts. 1, 4, and 5 of 'declaration of rights' (Thorpe, Vol. III, pp. 1686–1687); constitution of North Carolina, adopted 1776, arts. 1, 2, and 18 of 'declaration of rights.' (Thorpe, Vol. V, pp. 2787–2788); constitution of Georgia, adopted 1777, art. 1 (Thorpe, Vol. II, p. 778). See also Ware v. Hylton, 3 Dall., 199, 223.) The founders of our Government could, therefore, have seen no legal impropriety or deterrent in a State creating for itself a legislature of three houses (Was not the council of revision provided for in the New York constitution of 1777 (art. 3, Thorpe, Vol. V, p. 2628), in effect the germ of a third house of the State legislature?) with the electorate constituting practically the third house.

"While, of course, it is improbable that they conceived of the fully developed machinery of the initiative and referendum, as we have them to-day, it is, nevertheless, true that the genesis of both of these legislative processes appears in the early history of our country. In several instances the royal charters granted to the Colonies provided that a legislative body in the Colonies should be empowered to make laws, but that such laws should be subject to be annulled by the source of the charter powers. (Article IV of the Ordinances of Virginia (1621) provided in part: 'That no law or ordinance, made in the said general assembly, shall be or continue in force or validity, unless the same shall be solemnly ratified and confirmed in a general quarter court of said company here in England and so ratified be returned to them under our seal.' The charter to the Massachusetts Colony granted by William and Mary in 1691 provided in part that: 'In case we, our heirs, or successors, shall not within the term of three years after the presenting of such orders, laws, statutes, or ordinances [enacted by the colonial legislature] signify our or their disallowance of the same, then the said orders, laws, statutes, or ordinances shall be and continue in full force and effect.' (Thorpe, Vol. III, p. 1883.) [The capitalization, spelling, and punctuation of the foregoing have been modernized herein.]) Here is clearly the precursor of the referendum. And in some of the early State constitutions the right of the people to assemble and consult together and to instruct their representatives was distinctly asserted. (The constitution of Pennsylvania (1776), art. 14, provided 'that the people have a right to assemble together to consult for their common good, to instruct their representatives,' etc. (Thorpe, Vol. V, pp. 3082–3084.) The constitution of Maryland (1776), art. 5, provided 'that the right of the people to participate in the legislature is the best security of liberty and the foundation of all free government.' (Thorpe, Vol. III, pp. 1686–1687.) The constitution of North Carolina (1776), art. 18, of the 'declaration of rights,' is the same as the Pennsylvania provision quoted above. (Thorpe, Vol. V, pp. 2787–2788.) In August, 1789, the House of Representatives of the First Congress debated the advisability of adding a clause similar to the one in the Pennsylvania constitution to the Constitution of the United States. (Annals of Congress, Gales & Seaton's ed., 733–747.) The proposition to this effect was, however, defeated.) Plainly these provisions foreshadowed the latter-day initiative.

"The founders indisputably realized that the people in the several States had the right and the power to circumscribe the functions of their respective State legislatures so as to subject any action of a legislature to popular vote, and that consequence naturally followed from the conviction, which all of them must have had, that the people of the States were the exclusive source of governmental power in their respective States. (Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall., 419, 471; Van Horne's Lessee v. Dorrance, 2 Dall., 304, 308.) The New England town-meeting system of government prevailed when the Constitution was adopted, was familiar to virtually every enlightened citizen of the time, and was a perfect illustration of local government conducted under and by direct legislation. (People ex rel. Metropolitan St. Ry. Co. v. Tax Com'rs, 174 N. Y., 417, 432; In re Pfahler, 150 Calif., 71.) The makers of the Constitution may perhaps not have been able to envisage in full detail the highly complicated initiative and referendum systems of to-day; but, in the light of what then prevailed, no one can reasonably assert that if those systems had been laid before them they would have declared them at variance with any of the fundamental conceptions of the republican or constitutional system they were creating. The framers had beheld legislatures with but a single house, as in Connecticut, and the prospect of beholding legislatures of three bodies—the third and supreme house of which would be the electorate itself—can not reasonably be declared to have been beyond their ken.

"The Federal Constitution did not define the nature, composition, authority, or function of the 'legislatures' of the States upon whom power was conferred in Article V. The Constitution left the State legislatures precisely where it found them—exclusively under the control of the people of the respective States. When, therefore, the framers used the term 'legislatures' in Article V, they were employing it in its broadest sense to denote the legislative instrumentalities by which the legislative power of a State might be expressed in the several States at any time during the future life of the Nation. The all-pervading purpose was to have the people of the State express their will as to changing the fundamental law of the Nation. It is their will that was intended to govern, and they are to express that will through the legislative department of the respective State governments which they have established. (Of course, if Congress provided that ratification should be by conventions in the several States, such specially chosen bodies would have a direct mandate from the people of the States, and thus presumably record their will in the action they took.) But how that department should be constituted, how it should act, when it should act, what conditions should be imposed before its action became effective—all these matters were left by the Constitution to the States to settle according to their pleasure.

There is a body of discriminating and carefully considered authority which supports these views. (State ex rel. Schrader v. Polley, 26 S. Dak., 5; State ex rel. Davis v. Hildebrant, 94 Oh. St., 154, affirmed, 241 U. S., 565; State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 181 Pac., 920 (Supreme Court of Washington); State ex rel. Hopkins v. Amsbury, district court Lancaster County, Nebr., Morning, judge, Aug. 18, 1919; Hawke v. Smith, Supreme Court of Ohio, Sept. 30, 1919, affirming court of common pleas, Franklin County, Dillon, judge, June 19, 1919; Carson v. Sullivan, circuit court, Cole County, Mo., Slate, judge, no opinion; article by Everett P. Wheeler, Central Law Journal, May 19, 1919; Law Notes, July, 1919, p. 62.) It would unduly extend the discussion to set forth here adequate extracts from the foregoing authorities; but the pertinent passages of some of them have been printed in Appendix I to this brief. The opinions quoted from are exhaustive, well reasoned, and learned to an exceptional degree.

"It may be urged that the correct construction of the referendum provisions in the States renders them inapplicable to a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution. Even if that were true—and there is strong authority to the contrary (see, e. g., the cases referred to above)—it is beside the point. The primary question is not whether the State referendum provisions embrace Federal constitutional amendments within their terms, but whether those provisions (either with or without the initiative provisions in the particular State) render the electorate such a part of the legislative body of the State as to constitute them in effect a third house of the 'legislature' of the State within the meaning of Article V of the Constitution, and thus make their assent necessary to due and legal ratification by the State of a proposed amendment to the National Constitution. If the referendum provisions of a given State embrace proposed Federal constitutional amendments, that means that in the State in question there now exists adequate machinery for submitting the matter to the electorate. If, however, such referendum provisions do not in terms apply to proposed Federal constitutional amendments, that merely indicates a present want of due instrumentalities for procuring an expression of the will of the people on the question in hand, and renders it incumbent upon the State to enact such measures as may be requisite toward that end. Inasmuch as section 3 of the proposed amendment allows seven years for ratification by the several States, it is apparent that there is plenty of time for the creation of an orderly procedure in every initiative and referendum State for the purpose of enabling the respective electorates thereof to pronounce their judgment on the proposed Federal constitutional amendment in suit.

"Such cases as Herbring v. Brown (190 Pac., 328 (Oreg.)) are not in conflict with these contentions. It was held in the Herbring case that the existing provisions of the Oregon referendum laws were not applicable to a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution. It was not held, however, that under the initiative and referendum provisions in force in that State the electorate was not the repository of at least as much legislative power as its legislative assembly; in other words, it was not denied that in truth and effect the electorate of Oregon was an essential part of the 'legislature' of the State within the intent and meaning of that term in Article V of the Constitution. No one can reasonably doubt that under the Oregon constitution the electorate of the State retains virtually all the legislative power as its legislative assembly; in other words, it was not denied that in truth and effect the electorate of Oregon was an essential part of the 'legislature' of the State within the intent and meaning of that term in Article V of the Constitution. No one can reasonably doubt that under the Oregon constitution the electorate of the State retains virtually all the legislative power in its own hands. The question herein is whether, under such circumstances, the electorate of the State is not a part of the 'legislature,' whose ratification Article V of the Constitution requires. If it is, its assent must be procured. It may be true, as the Oregon court has held, that the present machinery in the State is not adapted to that purpose. But that merely renders it the duty of the legislature in Oregon to erect adequate statutory processes for the purpose, unless it wishes to remain disabled from acting upon proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution.

"The controlling inquiry, therefore, under this head is as to what constitutes a 'legislature' within the meaning of Article V of the Federal Constitution. It has been asserted that it consists solely of the legislative assembly of the State and that no State can limit the authority of any such representative body. But it is submitted that in those States where the initiative or the referendum or both are in general use, the 'legislature' of the State embraces the electorate as well, since the electorate is indisputably vested with a substantial part of the legislative power of those States. Upon this contention the Oregon case above cited did not pass. Neither has any other authority held to the contrary of our views, except the advisory opinion of the justices in Maine.

"It would surely be illogical to argue, as was done in the court below, that amending the Federal Constitution is not legislating in any sense. The cases ordinarily cited for this proposition hold no such doctrine. All that is intended to be declared in those cases is that 'the general assembly in amending the constitution, does not act in the exercise of its ordinary legislative authority. (State v. Cox, 8 Ark., 436, 443; Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall., 378, 381n.) Amending the Federal Constitution is certainly not ordinary legislation, and, consequently, it does not require many things generally required of the usual legislation, as, for example, the assent or veto of the Executive. But inasmuch as the process goes to the creation of the fundamental law in each State, it is necessarily lawmaking. Precisely because it is a legislative activity—although not ordinary legislation—it has been intrusted exclusively to those branches of the Federal and State Governments whose function it is to formulate the laws. The whole matter has been lucidly discussed in Hawke v. Smith, decided in the Supreme Court of Ohio on September 30, 1919, as yet unreported, as follows:

"'The functions conferred in different parts of the Federal Constitution upon the legislatures of the States are manifestly dual in their nature. For example, in the election of United States Senators by the legislatures of the several States, as provided by the Federal Constitution, until the recent amendment, the legislature acted as an electing power. It was not understood to be legislative and in States in which the governor had the veto power over legislation that power did not apply in the matter of electing Senators. The legislature represented the State in a manner similar to that in which the Electoral College represents it in the choice of President. On the other hand, the power conferred upon the legislatures in section 4 of Article I of the Federal Constitution, which confers power on the legislature of each State to prescribe the 'times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives,' is purely legislative, and, as already pointed out, in the exercise of that power all the legislative machinery of the State was called into action in the performance of that State legislative duty.

"It is true, as argued by counsel for plaintiff in error, that under Article V the State participates in an act which amends the Federal Constitution and in that sense performs a Federal function. But it does not follow that by the word 'legislature' in that section a corpus designatus is meant. It participates in the making of the fundamental law and its act is legislative in character. The making of the Constitution is the highest function of legislation. That being so, it follows that in the exercise of this legislative function of ratification, the makers of the Federal Constitution contemplated that all of the agencies provided by the State for legislation should be empowered to act in accordance with the provisions made by the State at the time the action on the ratification should be taken; and that the word 'legislature' in Article V is used in that sense. (The suggestion of the Ohio Supreme Court that the word 'legislature' in Article V of the Constitution may not have the same meaning as the same word in a different context in other portions of the Constitution, is clearly correct. (See, e. g., Texas v. White, 7 Wall. 700, 721.) This consideration makes pointless the fact that the 'legislature' referred to in other parts of the Constitution connotes merely the legislative assembly of the State.)

"It has been suggested that this decision is distinguishable because the Ohio constitution expressly provides for referring proposed amendments to the Federal Constitution to the electorate. But no such distinction exists. If the 'legislature' which may ratify a proposed amendment is the legislative assembly alone, if only that body is intended by the word 'legislature' as used in Article V of the Constitution of the United States, then manifestly no action by the State or the Congress can change the force and effect of the Constitution of the United States. It is only because the word 'legislature' in Article V signifies, not solely the legislative assembly of a State, but the repository of legislative power therein, that the provision in the Ohio constitution can have any force and effect whatever.

"The impropriety of permitting the legislative assembly of a State, in which the initiative or referendum prevails, to act upon a proposed amendment to the Federal Constitution to the exclusion of the electorate of the State, is emphasized in the case of such a State as Missouri. By section 3 of Article II of its constitution it is expressly provided as follows:

"'As the preservation of the States and the maintenance of their governments are necessary to an indestructible Union, and were intended to coexist with it, the legislature is not authorized to adopt, nor will the people of this State ever assent to any amendment or change of the Constitution of the United States which may in anywise impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of this State.'

"A clearer prohibition against ratification by the legislative assembly of any such amendment as the eighteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution, it would be difficult to express. Nevertheless, the legislature of Missouri saw fit to give its assent thereto, although it could, of course, not have been unaware of the fact that the 'change of the Constitution of the United States,' which the proposed amendment intended, would clearly 'impair the right of local self-government belonging to the people of the State.' See State ex rel. Mullen v. Howell, 181 Pac., 920, 922 (Wash.), quoted in Appendix (I), where the nature of the amendment is discussed.

"In another State, where, however, the referendum and initiative do not obtain, the plain will of the people, as expressed in the fundamental law, was likewise flouted by the legislative assembly. Section 19 of article 16 of the Florida constitution provides that—

"'No convention or legislature of this State shall act upon any amendment of the Constitution of the United States proposed by Congress to the several States, unless such convention or legislature shall have been elected after such amendment is submitted.' (Tennessee has a similar constitutional provision. It appears to have been complied with there.)

"But the Florida Legislature, although only in part elected after the so-called eighteenth amendment was proposed by Congress in December, 1917 (see Florida constitution, art. 3, secs. 2 and 3, and art. 7, sec. 2), nevertheless undertook to ratify the amendment on December 14, 1918, in clear violation and defiance of the constitution of the State.

"It follows from these premises that in 22 States of the Union (exclusive of the three which have not ratified the amendment) there has been only an apparent, but not in fact a valid, ratification of the so-called eighteenth amendment, and that, consequently, it can not yet be deemed to be a part of the Constitution of the United States and enforceable as such by the Congress and the several States.

"V.

"THE FOREGOING CONTENTIONS PRESENT JUSTICIABLE QUESTIONS.

"A.

"In final analysis, the decisive inquiries considered in this brief are whether or not the so-called eighteenth amendment is authorized by the Constitution, and whether or not it has been ratified in accordance with the express requirements of the Constitution. The court is called upon to determine whether there are not two implied limitations upon the right to amend the Constitution, namely, (1) that no amendment shall in its primary and essential nature constitute mere legislation as distinguished from a constitutional provision, and (2) that no amendment shall directly and substantially tend toward the destruction of the right of the several States to local self-government. The court is further called upon to determine whether the amendment has been duly ratified by the requisite number of 'legislatures' of the several States, in view of the fact that it was not submitted to the electorate in the States where the electorate has the initiative, or referendum, or both, in respect of State legislation. In other words, the questions raised call upon the court to construe and enforce implied and express limitations of the Constitution upon the power to amend under Article V. This is plainly a judicial function.

"It is argued that the inquiry concerning the invalidity of the so-called eighteenth amendment presents not a judicial, but solely a political question. A consideration of the nature of the plaintiff's contentions, however, should at once disclose that this objection is untenable. The plaintiff's claim is that the so-called amendment and the act of Congress enacted thereunder destroy its valuable business and property, and that they do so without constitutional authority or due process of law, inasmuch as the so-called amendment was adopted in violation of the limitations implied and inherent in Article V of the Constitution. Of course, what is implied in the Constitution is as effectually a part of it as what is expressed therein (Ex parte Yarbrough, 110 U. S., 651, 658); and if the limitations above contended for do in truth inhere in the Constitution and thus qualify and limit Article V, they must be accorded the same force and effect as if they were in express terms contained in that article. The court is, therefore, in the case at bar only called upon to construe Article V of the Constitution and to determine whether the plaintiff's rights have been unconstitutionally invaded. That is an ordinary judicial controversy involving a justiciable question over which the courts clearly have jurisdiction. (United States v. Lee, 106 U. S., 196, 208–9; Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605, 619; Koehler & Lange v. Hill, 60 Iowa, 543, 623–4; Hammond v. Clark, 136 Ga., 313; 12 Corpus Juris, p. 880 and cases cited.)

"It is, of course, plainly the duty of the courts 'to say what the law is.' Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 176; The Federalist, No. 78 (Ford's ed.), p. 521. For that reason it is necessarily their duty to determine the constitutionality of a statute; and, for the same reason, it must be their duty to decide what is in law and in fact a part of the Constitution. Ellingham v. Dye, 19 N. E., 1, 21 (Ind.). How else can they know, declare, and enforce only what is the law and nothing else? In Cohens v. Virginia, 6 Wheat., 264, 384, Chief Justice Marshall declared that—

"'The judicial power of every well constituted government must be coextensive with the legislative and must be capable of deciding every judicial question which grows out of the Constitution and laws. If any proposition may be considered as a political axiom, this, we think, may be so considered.'

"And in Hollingsworth v. Virginia, 3 Dall., 378, 381, 382, this court actually considered and determined whether the eleventh amendment to the Constitution had been validly adopted.

"The argument in opposition to the so-called eighteenth amendment that it tends toward the destruction of the right of the several States to local self-government and distinctive existence does not change the otherwise justiciable nature of the controversy. The authorities sustaining the principle announced and enforced in The Collector v. Day (11 Wall., 113) conclusively dispose of this suggestion. That leading case held that a Federal taxing act was invalid because it purported to tax a governmental instrumentality of a State, and the ground of the decision was, not that there was any express constitutional provision to that effect, but solely the 'necessary implication' derived from the Constitution and 'upheld by the great law of self-preservation' (at pp. 125, 127). If the case at bar presents only a political controversy, then The Collector v. Day and the well-considered authorities following it were wrongly decided, because in them substantially the same contention as is here put forward was not only entertained as a justiciable question but approved and enforced.

"The case of Georgia v. Stanton (6 Wall., 50) does not in any wise conflict with the foregoing contention. It would, indeed, be curious if it did, since the opinion of the court in that case and in the later case of The Collector v. Day were both delivered by Mr. Justice Nelson. In Georgia v. Stanton the State sued to enjoin the carrying out by the defendants of the so-called 'reconstruction acts,' which Congress had passed after the Civil War in order to establish a republican form of government in the rebel States. The duty to secure to the States a republican form of government and the right to decide what kind of State government is republican in form are exclusively vested in the political departments of the Federal Government. (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 1; Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon, 223 U. S., 118; Mountain Timber Co. v. Washington, 243 U. S., 219, 234.) The validity of the reconstruction acts was consequently not open to question in the courts; and the defendants in Georgia v. Stanton were acting under laws which the legislative department of the Government had a right to pass and the courts no right to review; and the suit was, therefore, one not maintainable, not only as involving a political question but as in effect a suit against the United States itself. (Oregon v. Hitchcock, 202 U. S., 60, 68–69.) The present suit is against officers specially charged with the enforcement of an act of Congress which is alleged to be unconstitutional, and which the courts have the right and the power to declare to be unconstitutional. (Philadelphia Co. v. Stimson, 223 U. S., 605, 619.)

Nor is there anything novel in the nature of the questions discussed in the preceding points of this brief, for questions quite similar in character have been repeatedly before the courts and have been adjudicated as ordinary justiciable questions. Thus, for example, in Eason v. State (11 Ark., 481, 491) and State v. Keith (63 N. C., 140, 144) constitutional amendments purporting to nullify essential parts of the bill of rights were held invalid and unauthorized because of the necessary implications deemed by the court to arise out of the constitutions there under consideration operating to forbid amendments of such a nature; and in Knight v. Shelton (134 Fed., 423, 426) and Koehler & Lange v. Hill (60 Iowa, 543, 603) constitutional amendments were likewise held void by the courts for failure to comply with express conditions prescribed in constitutions for their amendment. As stated by a learned court after an exhaustive review of the point (McConaughy v. Secretary of State, 106 Minn., 392, 409):

"'The authorities are practically uniform in holding that whether a constitutional amendment has been properly adopted according to the requirements of an existing constitution is a judicial question.'

"The opposite view, as Chief Justice Day pointed out in Koehler & Lange v. Hill, supra, in effect amounts to a declaration—

"'That the provisions of the Constitution for its own amendment are simply directory and may be disregarded, with impunity; for it is idle to say that these requirements of the Constitution must be observed, if the departments charged with their observance are the sole judges as to whether or not they have been complied with.'

"See also the reasoning in Bott v. Secretary of State, 63 N. J. L., 289, and Oakland Paving Co. v. Hilton, 69 Calif., 479.

"It would certainly be vain for a constitution to declare or imply limitations upon the power to amend it, if those limitations could be transgressed at will by the very persons who were intended by the people to be restrained and confined within fixed or prescribed limits. Any such doctrine would empower agents of the Government or of the people to exceed their authority at pleasure. As the authorities cited disclose, the weight of judicial opinion has regarded the question whether an amendment to a State constitution has been duly adopted as involving an ordinary judicial inquiry. It would seem, therefore, necessarily to follow that the same conclusion is a fortiori correct in respect of an amendment to the Federal Constitution. Amendments to the Federal Constitution have so far been solely the work of delegated agents, namely, the Houses of Congress and the legislatures of the States; the people as such have not been consulted. It ought, consequently, to be a justiciable question whether these agents have or have not transcended their limited authority. Where State constitutions are amended the proposed amendment is in every instance submitted to the people to pass upon. In such cases it might be proper to view the limitations upon the power to amend State constitutions merely as directory and to regard the vote of the people as corrective and conclusive; but, nevertheless, as we have seen above, even amendments to State constitutions, directly voted upon by the people of the States, have been held null and void when they conflicted with any of the express or implied constitutional limitations upon the amending power.

"It should further be borne in mind that the question is not whether a constitution is valid. A court organized and holding office under a constitution is not to be considered authorized to decide whether that constitution exists. It owes its very existence and whatever authority it has to that constitution; it is sworn to uphold that very instrument; the case which would raise any question of the validity of the constitution could only come before it under the self-same constitution, and, therefore, both the court and the parties should not be heard to repudiate the existence of that constitution. A decree of a court that a constitution was illegal in toto might operate to leave no lawfully constituted authority in power and remit the people to a state of anarchy. None of these considerations, which might render wholly political and nonjusticiable the question whether the government and its constitution are lawful, is in any wise operative in the case at bar. The plaintiff is but seeking to uphold and enforce the Constitution of the United States and its limitations and provisions. There is, therefore, no vestige of similarity between such a case as this and those controversies illustrated by authorities like Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1), which involves questions essentially political and nonjusticiable in their character.

"An effort was made by counsel in the court below to distinguish the cases which had held void constitutional amendments not adopted in accordance with the procedure prescribed in a State constitution from a case in which it was objected that the attempted amendment was of such a nature as not to be a legitimate or authorized subject of a constitutional amendment. The former was conceded to present a justiciable controversy; the latter, it was contended, did not. The distinction, however, is quite untenable. It exalts requirements of a constitution having to do with matters of mere form over requirements in the same instrument governing the most serious matters of substance. If one essential limitation of a constitution may be regarded as more binding than another, it is manifest that one relating to substance should take precedence over one relating merely to procedure. But the argument in question attempts to reverse this obvious relation, and affords judicial protection to matters of form, while denying any right to the courts to protect even the most momentous requirements of substance. As might be expected, such a contention is without support in authority; and, indeed, as stated above, was ruled to the direct contrary in Eason v. State (11 Ark., 481, 491). See, also, Ellingham v. Dye (19 N. E., 1, 21), where it was said that—

"'The power to determine and declare the law covers the whole body of the law, fundamental and ordinary; the latter being those laws which apply to particulars and are tentative, occasional, and in the nature of temporary expedients. Whether legislative action is void for want of power in that body, or because the constitutional forms or conditions have not been followed or have been violated, may become a judicial question, and upon the courts the inevasible duty to determine it falls. And so the power resides in the courts, and they have, with practical uniformity, exercised the authority to determine the validity of proposal, submission, or ratification of changes in the organic law. Such is the rule in this State.'

"B.

"Equally untenable is the contention that the proclamation of the Acting Secretary of State of the United States, announcing the due ratification of the amendment, has rendered nonjusticiable in the courts the question of the validity and due adoption of the alleged eighteenth amendment.

"The foremost fact to bear in mind in connection with this contention is that the Constitution of the United States does not provide for any finding, determination, or even notice of an amendment by the Secretary of State or any other officer. Article V merely declares that an amendment which has been duly proposed 'shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of this Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States.' By the express declaration of the Constitution, therefore, only an amendment which has actually become such in truth and in law is provided for, and not an amendment which some ministerial or legislative officer believes or declares to have validly become a part of the Constitution. Thus, an amendment which had been duly ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States would automatically become part of the Constitution despite the fact that a Secretary of State might refuse to announce it because he erroneously believed the ratifications to be defective for some reason. No court would hesitate to disregard his error of law or fact under the circumstances supposed. Likewise, the action of a Secretary of State in proclaiming that an amendment was in effect, when it had not yet been ratified by the requisite number of States, or when it had not yet been ratified by all the houses of the legislature in the requisite number of States, would have to be regarded as a nullity. Any other result would mean that amendments could be made to the Constitution only if they won the approval of the Secretary of State. Such an interpretation of the fundamental law is plainly erroneous. To refuse an injured party the right to call the action of the Secretary of State into question in the courts would be, to all practical intents and purposes, refusing to uphold the Constitution and permitting it to be nullified at will by a mere ministerial officer.

"This very amendment and what has been done under it disclose the soundness of this view. The officers of the Federal Government have assumed or declared that the eighteenth amendment became law on January 16, 1919, when the requisite number of States are supposed to have ratified it, and thus became enforceable on January 16, 1920, according to its terms. But, as the court will perceive on reading the proclamation of the Acting Secretary of State, the only date mentioned therein is January 29, 1919. The Secretary does not so much as refer to January 16, 1919, and if his declaration or finding were necessary or could be effective for any purpose, it is plain that this amendment could not be properly regarded as law by anyone prior to January 29, 1919. The reason, however, why no one can logically argue for such an outcome is obvious. It is merely because the Constitution itself in Article V has in mandatory terms provided that an amendment 'shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution,' not when so found or declared by the Secretary of State or anyone else, but solely 'when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress.'

"The Constitution having provided the circumstances under which an amendment shall become effective, of course Congress may not add to or detract from them. Otherwise, Congress would have power to override or nullify the Constitution. It follows that even if there were a statute remitting to the Secretary of State the right conclusively to determine whether a proposed amendment was in force and effect, it would be a mere nullity. But there is in fact no such statute. Section 205 of the Revised Statutes does not even purport to vest any such authority. It merely provides that—

"'Whenever official notice is received at the Department of State that any amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States has been adopted, according to the provisions of the Constitution, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause the amendment to be published in the newspapers authorized to promulgate the laws, with his certificate, specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted, and that the same has become valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution of the United States.'

"Accordingly, the Secretary of State may give notice only when an amendment in fact 'has been adopted according to the provisions of the Constitution,' and not otherwise; and even then may only certify, not that he now finds or declares the amendment to be valid, but only that because theretofore duly adopted, 'the same has become valid,' etc. The Secretary of State, in acting under section 205 of the Revised Statutes, is performing a ministerial and not a judicial function, and if he errs, it must be manifest that his errors, whether of fact or law, are binding on no one and may be corrected by the courts.

"There is an unbroken current of authority which supports these views. (Hawke v. Smith, Court of Common Pleas, Franklin County, Dillon, J., June 19, 1919, affirmed by the Ohio Supreme Court, September 30, 1919; McConaughy v. Secretary of State, 106 Minn., 392, 408–414; Knight v. Shelton, 134 Fed., 423, 438–440; Bott v. Secretary of State, 63 N. J. L., 289.) In Hawke v. Smith, supra, the court dealt with the precise question herein involved, and held that the proclamation of the Acting Secretary of State 'of course, has no legal force or effect' upon the case. The same view has recently been expressed by District Judge Rudkin in the matter of Dillon, U. S. D. C., N. D., Calif., January 27, 1920, who said:

"'The promulgation of a constitutional amendment under section 205 is no more essential to its validity than is the promulgation of an act of Congress under the preceding section, and the former is no more the beginning of the amendment than the latter is the beginning of the law. For, notwithstanding the requirement for promulgation, it is universally recognized that an act of Congress takes effect and is in force from the date of its passage and approval, and a constitutional amendment is likewise in full force and effect from and after its ratification by the requisite number of States.'

"In the well-considered case of McConaughy v. Secretary of State, supra, the court, after an extensive review of the authorities, said:

"'The recent case of Rice v. Palmer, 78 Ark., 432, 440, presented the identical question which we have under consideration. In reference to the contention that the Constitution intended to delegate to the Speaker of the House of Representatives the power to determine whether an amendment had been adopted, and that the question was political, and not judicial, the court observed: "This argument has often been made in similar cases to the courts, and it is found in many dissenting opinions, but, with possibly a few exceptions, it is not found in the prevailing opinion."' * * *

"'There can be little doubt that the consensus of judicial opinion is to the effect that it is the absolute duty of the judiciary to determine whether the Constitution has been amended in the manner required by the Constitution, unless a special tribunal has been created to determine the question; and even then many of the courts hold that the tribunal can not be permitted to illegally amend the organic law. There is some authority for the view that when the Constitution itself creates a special tribunal, and confides to it the exclusive power to canvass votes and declare the results, and makes the amendment a part of the Constitution as a result of such declaration by proclamation or otherwise, the action of such tribunal is final and conclusive. It may be conceded that this is true when it clearly appears that such was the intention of the people when they adopted the Constitution. The right to provide a special tribunal is not open to question; but it is very certain that the people of Minnesota have not done so.'

"It must, therefore, be manifest that the Constitution of the United States does not make the Secretary of State or any other nonjudicial body a special tribunal to determine whether the Constitution has or has not been amended; and it is equally plain that section 205 of the Revised Statutes does not purport to do so. But even if it did, it would be of no effect; the Constitution can not be validly amended except in compliance with its own provisions, both those expressed and those implied. It is the duty of the courts to say what the Constitution means and requires, and it is elementary that Congress can not derogate from the judicial power and vest judicial duties in nonjudicial officers. If, consequently, Congress had attempted in section 205 to make the Secretary of State the sole judge of the question whether the Constitution had or had not been properly amended, its action would be void. So the court declared in Knight v. Shelton, 134 Fed., 423, 439, where the following language was used:

"'In neither of these acts did the legislature attempt to make the decision of the canvassing board conclusive, and for this reason it is unnecessary to determine whether it possessed such power, which, in view of the fact that the constitution established three departments—the legislative, executive, and judicial—and vested all judicial powers in the judicial department, except jurisdiction to determine contests for certain State officers hereinbefore mentioned, is at least doubtful. To hold, in the absence of any express provision in the constitution depriving the judicial department of the State of any of the functions which naturally belong to that department, that the legislature could take away that power would be violative of the spirit which pervades not only the constitution of this State, but that of every other State of this Union. It would, in effect, make that department an inferior, and not a coordinate, branch of the Government. The independence of the courts in unhesitatingly declaring acts in conflict with the constitution void, and thus reviewing the acts of the legislative department of the State, has done more to preserve the blessings of liberty which we now enjoy than any other act of any department of the Government.'

"It is vain to urge that because State ministerial officers have transmitted the alleged ratifications of the eighteenth amendment by their respective States, the validity and legal effect of the action of the States may not be inquired into. What is the 'legislature' of a State under Article V of the Constitution, or a proper amendment thereunder, are Federal questions, the decision of which this court, of course, can not abdicate because a ministerial State officer has attempted to decide them. Moreover, there is no statutory authority conferred upon such an officer by the States or the United States conclusively to pass upon the matter. The considerations above urged in respect of the Secretary of State apply with even greater force to the State functionaries transmitting alleged ratifications.

CONCLUSION.

"It is submitted that the destruction of the liquor traffic, even if desirable in some aspects, at the expense of ultimately subverting our Federal system and local self-government and turning our Constitution into a mere code of statutory enactments, of erecting a constitutional precedent which will afford legal justification for spoliation and the destruction of republican government, and of leaving every natural right, whether of life, liberty, or property, wholly at the mercy of future constitutional amendment, may be too high a price to pay for even the greatest reform, and such a misfortune should not be visited upon the people of the United States because a comparatively small minority of them are incapable of self-restraint in the use of liquor. It may be the duty of government to protect the comparatively few weak and degenerate among the people, but it can not be its duty to remedy even an admitted evil if such remedy necessarily involves laying the foundation for the possible ultimate overthrow of our Federal system of government.

"It is, therefore, submitted that the alleged eighteenth amendment should be declared to be void, and that the decree of the court below should be reversed and the plaintiff's motion for an injunction pendente lite granted.

"IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES.

"October Term, 1919.

"[Christian Feigenspan, a corporation, appellant, v. Joseph L. Bodine, United States attorney for the district of New Jersey, and Charles V. Duffy, collector of internal revenue, of the fifth district of New Jersey, appellees. No. 788. On appeal from the District Court of the United States for the District of New Jersey.]

"BRIEF FOR THE APPELLEES.

"This is an appeal from a decree of the district court dismissing a bill filed by the appellant to enjoin a United States district attorney and a deputy collector of internal revenue from enforcing against it the provisions of the act of Congress of October 28, 1919 (41 Stat., c. 83, p. 305), known as the Volstead Act, and intended to enforce the eighteenth amendment to the Constitution.

"STATEMENT OF THE CASE.

"The appellant, a New Jersey corporation, for many years has been engaged in the manufacture and sale of beer. It alleges that it has on hand a large quantity of beer, containing not to exceed 2.75 per cent of alcohol, which was lawfully manufactured prior to the passage of the Volstead Act. This beer is alleged to be, in fact, nonintoxicating, and the right is asserted to continue to manufacture it. Indeed, the right is asserted to manufacture and sell intoxicating beer after the war prohibition act shall cease to be in effect, plaintiff contending that the eighteenth amendment is invalid, and that, when the war prohibition act ceases to be in effect Congress will be without authority to prohibit the sale or manufacture of intoxicating beverages within the State of New Jersey. If mistaken in this contention, appellant insists that the Volstead Act, in so far as it prohibits the sale of beer which is not, in fact, intoxicating, and in so far as it destroys the value of lawfully preexisting property, is unconstitutional.

"CONSTITUTIONAL PROVISIONS AND STATUTES INVOLVED.

"The provision of the Constitution relating to amendments is Article V, which is as follows:

"'The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution, or, on the application of the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States, shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths thereof, as the one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by the Congress: Provided, That no amendment which may be made prior to the year 1808 shall in any manner affect the first and fourth clauses in the ninth section of the first article, and that no State, without its consent, shall be deprived of its equal suffrage in the Senate.'

"Section 205 of the Revised Statutes, taken from the act of April 20, 1818, is as follows:

"'Whenever official notice is received at the Department of State that any amendment proposed to the Constitution of the United States has been adopted according to the provisions of the Constitution, the Secretary of State shall forthwith cause the amendment to be published in the newspapers authorized to promulgate the laws, with his certificate, specifying the States by which the same may have been adopted, and that the same has become valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the Constitution of the United States.'

"In December, 1917, by a vote of two-thirds of each House, Congress passed a resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as follows (40 Stat., 1050):

"'Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), That the following amendment to the Constitution be, and hereby is, proposed to the States, to become valid as a part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of the several States as provided by the Constitution:

"ARTICLE —.

"'SECTION 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes is hereby prohibited.

"'SEC. 2. The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.

"'SEC. 3. This article shall be inoperative unless it shall have been ratified as an amendment to the Constitution by the legislatures of the several States, as provided in the Constitution, within seven years from the date of the submission hereof to the States by the Congress.'

"On January 29, 1919, the legislatures of 36 of the States having ratified the amendment thus proposed, the Secretary of State issued his proclamation declaring the same a part of the Constitution. Subsequently, the legislatures of nine other States ratified, leaving only the States of Rhode Island, Connecticut, and New Jersey not ratifying. On October 28, 1919, Congress passed the Volstead Act. Title I of that act was intended to secure a more efficient enforcement of the act known as the war prohibition act, and to this end provided, among other things, that thereafter the term 'intoxicating liquor,' as used in that act, should be deemed to include all beverages of the classes mentioned containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. Title II was to take effect upon the going into effect of the eighteenth amendment, and prohibited the sale, manufacture, and importation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes and prescribed penalties to be imposed upon offenders. Section 1 of Title II contains this provision:

"'The word "liquor" or the phrase "intoxicating liquor" shall be construed to include alcohol, brandy, whisky, rum, gin, beer, ale, porter, and wine, and in addition thereto any spirituous, vinous, malt, or fermented liquor, liquids, and compounds, whether medicated, proprietary, patented, or not, and by whatever name called, containing one-half of 1 per cent, or more, of alcohol by volume, which are fit for use for beverage purposes: Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter, or wine is produced, if it contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and is made as prescribed in section 37 of this title, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in, or from, such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the commissioner may by regulation prescribe.'

"THE CONTENTIONS OF APPELLANT.

"The bill assails the eighteenth amendment itself, the Volstead Act as a whole, and the section of that act defining intoxicating liquor. The specific contentions are as follows:

"1. The eighteenth amendment is not within the amending power, because it is mere legislation and not a proper amendment of the Constitution.

"2. Article V of the Constitution of the United States does not authorize an amendment which directly, or in principle, tends to impair and destroy the reserved police or governmental powers of the several States and their right to local self-government.

"3. It does not appear that two-thirds of both Houses of Congress deemed the eighteenth amendment necessary.

"4. The eighteenth amendment has not become a part of the Constitution because it has not been ratified by 36 of the States, since in some of the States the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution by the legislature is subject to the referendum features of the State constitution.

"5. The Volstead Act, if otherwise constitutional, is not in effect in New Jersey, because it has not been concurred in by the legislature of that State.

"6. Assuming the eighteenth amendment to be valid, and that Congress has the power without the concurrence of the several States to enact legislation for its enforcement, the definition of intoxicating liquor contained in the Volstead Act is not appropriate enforcement legislation and is unconstitutional.

"7. The Volstead Act, as applied to lawfully acquired preexisting property, is unconstitutional.

"THE CONTENTIONS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

"The Government challenges all of the above contentions and insists:

"1. The first four contentions present questions which are committed by the Constitution to the political branch of the Government for determination and are not justiciable questions.

"2. The eighteenth amendment establishes a fundamental rule of law and confers the power to legislate to enforce it, and is clearly an amendment within the meaning of Article V of the Constitution.

"3. Article V of the Constitution provides the means by which powers which had previously been reserved to the States or the people thereof may be conferred upon the Federal Government, and confides to the proposing and ratifying bodies named therein the power to determine the nature and wisdom of and the method for adopting any amendment to the Constitution except as in said article otherwise provided.

"4. The passage, by the votes of two-thirds of both Houses, of a resolution proposing an amendment, and reciting that two-thirds of each House concur therein, establishes the fact that two-thirds of both Houses deem such proposal necessary within the meaning of Article V.

"5. The eighteenth amendment has been ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States. In ratifying an amendment to the Federal Constitution the legislature of a State performs a function and exercises a power expressly conferred upon it by the people of the United States through the Constitution of the United States, and this power can not be abrogated, altered, restricted, or conditioned by any provisions of a State law or a State constitution.

"6. The second section of the eighteenth amendment confers upon Congress the power to legislate for the enforcement of section 1. The passage of an appropriate enforcement act by Congress makes the act a law, and no concurrence of the legislature of the State is necessary to render it effective throughout the entire United States.

"7. In order to effectively enforce the prohibition against intoxicating liquors Congress had ample power to adopt the definition contained in the Volstead Act as a means appropriate to such enforcement.

"8. The Volstead Act is an exercise of the police power, and whatever hardships may result from the destruction or impairment of the value of property or of beer heretofore lawfully manufactured, it can not be said that there has been such a taking of property or beer as requires compensation, or that the resulting impairment of values is unconstitutional.

"BRIEF.

"In other cases recently heard and still undecided, all the questions involved in this case have been submitted to the court for determination. Some of those cases have presented one question, and some others. The present case, however, has combined in one bill nearly all the questions which have been urged in the other cases. In each case heretofore heard the Government has contented itself with replying to the particular questions raised in that case. While this brief contains a repetition of arguments previously presented, it is thought that it may be helpful to collect in one brief the arguments in support of the Government's contentions on all of these questions and obviate the necessity of referring to separate briefs for some of them.

"I.—Nature and effect of the eighteenth amendment.

"Before taking up appellant's contentions specifically it may be well to examine for a moment in some detail the eighteenth amendment and consider just what it is and what its presence as a part of the Constitution will mean. Unquestionably, speaking in general terms, section 1 establishes a fundamental rule of governmental policy, and section 2 confers power to enforce this rule. It deals generally with the nation-wide subject of intoxicating liquors.

"Prior to the adoption of this amendment the several States had plenary power to deal with the subject of intoxicating liquors within their borders, except in such manner as the same interfered with powers which could be lawfully exercised by Congress. Congress had no power, except as an incident to its war powers, or some other express power, to prohibit either the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors. Under its taxing power, and for the purpose of insuring the collection of taxes, it did have the right to regulate and impose conditions upon both such manufacture and sale. Under its power to regulate foreign commerce, it probably had the power to prohibit the importation or exportation of intoxicating liquor. Under its power to regulate interstate commerce, it could prohibit the transportation of intoxicating liquors therein. It had exercised this power in aid of the prohibition laws of the several States. By the Webb-Kenyon Act (37 Stat., c. 90, p. 699) it divested intoxicating liquors of their interstate character when intended to be received, possessed, sold, or in any manner used in violation of the law of any State into which they were shipped.

"In holding that act constitutional this court said that 'in view of the nature and character of intoxicants' Congress had the power to forbid their movement in interstate commerce, but that instead of so doing it had simply established a regulation making it impossible for one State to violate the prohibition laws of another through the channels of interstate commerce. The result was that after the passage of the Webb-Kenyon law a State could prohibit the transportation into it of intoxicating liquors from another State when they were to be used in violation of its own laws. (Clark Distilling Co. v. Western Maryland Ry. Co., 242 U. S., 311.) In other words, Congress had the power, if it saw fit, to absolutely prohibit the transportation into a State of intoxicating liquors. At the same time the State had the right to prohibit such transportation when the receipt or use of such liquors would be contrary to its own laws. Later, Congress, by the Reed amendment (39 Stat., c. 162, pp. 1058, 1069), imposed its own prohibition by making it unlawful to transport in interstate commerce intoxicating liquors into any State whose laws forbade the manufacture or sale of such liquors for beverage purposes. Thereafter a shipment of liquor into such a State would be a violation both of the Federal law and the State law. Congress, of course, had plenary power to prohibit or regulate the liquor traffic in the District of Columbia and the Territories.

"This was the state of the law when the eighteenth amendment was proposed. The first section simply provides that the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquor for beverage purposes is prohibited throughout the United States. Standing alone, this merely establishes a fundamental rule of law to which all legislation, either by Congress or the legislatures of the States, shall be subject. It leaves the liquor traffic within a State subject to the police power of that State, but imposes upon the exercise of that power, in regulating the traffic, the condition that manufacture, sale, or transportation for beverage purposes shall not be made lawful. For the suppression of the traffic, the police powers of the States are left untouched.

"The fundamental rule of law thus established imposes a limitation upon the power of Congress to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. This power remains the same that it was before, with the exception that in regulating such commerce Congress has been forbidden to permit the transportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. The amendment says to Congress: 'You may regulate interstate commerce and foreign commerce as you see fit, except that you must recognize that intoxicating liquors intended for beverage purposes are no longer legitimate articles of interstate or foreign commerce.' In other words, by the Webb-Kenyon Act Congress had divested them of their interstate character in certain cases. The Constitution now makes this divestiture permanent and complete when they are intended for beverage purposes. The Reed amendment had prohibited the transportation of intoxicating liquors into prohibition States. The constitutional prohibition made all the States prohibition States and extended the principle of the Reed amendment to all interstate and foreign commerce.

"Section 1 of the eighteenth amendment may also be said to be a limitation upon the incidental powers which Congress exercises in enforcing its power of taxation. Heretofore it has had the power to tax both the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. In order to secure the payment of taxes levied, it has had the incidental power to regulate and oversee both the manufacture and sale of such liquors. It has, in fact, permitted their manufacture only under governmental supervision. Regardless of the use for which they were intended, it still has the power to tax such liquors if they shall be manufactured; but section 1 of the eighteenth amendment forbids the Government to permit or supervise their manufacture if intended for beverage purposes.

"Section 1 thus confers no power. It effects, rather, a limitation upon powers which had previously been exercised both by Congress and the legislatures of the several States.

"Section 2, however, was intended to make the prohibition effective by legislation to give it activity and by securing the punishment of those who violate it. For this reason it was deemed necessary to confer addditional power upon Congress; but evidently it was not thought proper to curtail the continued exercise by the States of the power they already had to suppress the liquor traffic. A second section was therefore added, to the effect that 'the Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"On the argument of one of the cases recently heard it was stated generally by counsel for the Government that this section could hardly be said to confer power upon the States to legislate for the suppression of the liquor traffic, since they already had plenary power on that subject; that is, it did not confer on the States any power which they did not previously possess. But making prohibition a national policy and mandate might well have made the enforcement of the amendment solely a matter of Federal power. This section 2, therefore, does confer on the several States the power to enforce this mandate of the Federal law within their borders by such appropriate means as they see fit, while leaving the power of Congress to legislate to carry out its views by Federal statutes throughout the entire United States.

"The effect of section 2, therefore, was to confer upon Congress the same scope of power throughout the Union and territory subject to the United States that the States already had as to their respective areas and to declare that the powers of the two governments should be concurrent and the exercise by one should not interfere with the other.

"It would seem to be a fair summary of the eighteenth amendment as a whole to say that Congress and the several States shall concurrently have the power to deal with the subject of intoxicating beverages, but that the powers of both shall be subject to the limitation that the manufacture, sale, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes shall be unlawful. Taking this fundamental rule as a starting point, each may legislate for the suppression of the traffic in such way as it deems necessary.

"II. Questions committed by the Constitution to the political branch of the Government for determination.

"It is said that the nature of this amendment is such that it is not within the amending power created by Article V of the Constitution. The contention is, first, that it is not in fact an amendment at all, but is merely legislation under the guise of an amendment. In the second place, it is asserted that the rights previously reserved to the States can not be taken away from them in the method provided by Article V for adopting amendments. It is also claimed that the ratification by the legislature is not final in those States whose constitutions provide for a referendum.

"It may be conceded that if there is anything in the Constitution which defines an amendment in such a way as to exclude one of the nature of that now in question or if it can be said that the Constitution of the United States reserves to the people of a State the right to control the legislature in the ratification of an amendment, the court could properly declare the eighteenth amendment invalid for a noncompliance with such restriction. But if the Constitution has not defined an amendment or has left it to the political branch of the Government to determine what amendments are necessary or proper, and if, under a true interpretation of the Constitution, the power to determine when an amendment has been ratified by the requisite number of legislatures, as provided in Article V, belongs to the political branch of the Government, then neither of these questions is justiciable, but both are political.

"The Constitution nowhere refers to the subject of amendments except in Article V. That article does not attempt a definition of the word 'amendment.' It places no limitation upon the character of amendments which may be made, except with respect to the equal suffrage of the States in the Senate and one temporary restriction, to be in effect only until 1808. With these exceptions it is expressly provided that any amendment may be proposed which two-thirds of the Members of both Houses of Congress deem it necessary to propose. In so many words, then, the constitutional test of whether a change shall be made in the Constitution, whether something shall be stricken from it or something added thereto, is whether two-thirds of the Members of both Houses of Congress deem it necessary to propose such amendment. When, in obedience to the Constitution, therefore, Congress has determined that a particular rule of law or of government is the proper subject matter of an amendment, and deems it necessary to propose such an amendment, by what authority can the courts review and reverse the deliberate judgment of Congress? The only limitation upon the power of Congress is that two-thirds of the Members of both Houses shall deem the proposed action necessary. The reviewing authority is the legislatures or conventions of the States. The required concurrence of three-fourths is the check on an improper proposal of the Congress.

"The question upon which the proposal of a particular amendment must depend is clearly, then, purely a question of policy. Authorities need not be cited to show the unbroken rule established by this court that the judgment of Congress on mere matters of policy committed to it is not open to review by the courts. The contrary contention in this case rests alone upon the fallacy that whenever there is a controversy arising out of any provision of the Constitution of the United States its final determination is committed to the judiciary. There is, however, nothing in the Constitution which gives color to so broad a contention. The only express grant of power to the courts is contained in the provision of Article III, that—

"'The judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one supreme court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish.'

"Section 2 of the same article confines this judicial power to 'cases in law and equity.' The courts are authorized, therefore, only to decide such questions, whether growing out of the Constitution or not, as may properly arise in an actual case, either in law or equity. There is no intimation of an intention to make the judicial power any broader or more extensive than it had theretofore been understood to be. On the contrary, every express provision of the Constitution relating to this power is in the nature of a restriction rather than an enlargement—such as the provision for trial by jury and that criminal trials shall be held in the State where the crime has been committed and the rights secured to the accused by the fifth amendment. It can not be said that at the time the Constitution was adopted there was any feeling that the power to determine constitutional questions arising in the conduct of the Government could not be safely reposed elsewhere than in the courts. On the contrary, there was at that time a strong feeling that too much power in the courts would be a source of danger to the future Republic.

"It is undoubtedly true that the experience of nearly a century and a half has led to greater confidence in the wisdom of having the judiciary determine finally questions of a legal nature arising out of the Constitution. But the framers of the Constitution, impressed with the necessity of retaining as much power as possible in the people and their direct representatives, considered that there were many questions that would arise in the conduct of the Government which should not be committed to the courts, but which should be dealt with through other branches of the Government. Hence there are numerous constitutional questions which the Constitution has expressly committed to some other branch of the Government for decision and others which, this court has held, a fair interpretation of the Constitution likewise commits to other branches of the Government.

"The Constitution, in Artcile IV, section 4, provides that the United States shall guarantee to every State a republican form of government and shall protect each State against invasion and, on application of the legislature or of the executive, against domestic violence. There is no express provision declaring by what authority it shall be determined that a particular form of government is republican. But it is now thoroughly settled that this court can never be called on to determine whether a particular State government is republican in form. The same article also provides that the United States shall protect each of the States against invasion, and 'on application of the legislature, or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened) against domestic violence.' Early in the history of the country these provisions of the Constitution were brought before this court in a case arising in Rhode Island. There were two governments, each claiming to be the real government of the State, and it was sought to have this court determine which, in fact, was the government of the State. The court, however, said that—

"'as the United States guarantee to each State a republican government, Congress must necessarily decide what government is established in the State before it can determine whether it is republican or not. * * * And its decision is binding on every other department of the Government, and could not be questioned in a judicial tribunal.' (Luther v. Borden, 7 How., 42.)

"It was also held:

"'It rested with Congress, too, to determine upon the means proper to be adopted to fulfill this guarantee. They might, if they had deemed it most advisable to do so, have placed it in the power of a court to decide when the contingency had happened which required the Federal Government to interfere. But Congress thought otherwise, and no doubt wisely; and by the act of February 28, 1795, provided "that the President should determine.' (Id., 42–43.)

"And again:

"'By this act the power of deciding whether the exigency had arisen upon which the Government of the United States is bound to interfere is given to the President. He is to act upon the application of the legislature or of the executive, and consequently he must determine what body of men constitute the legislature, and who is the governor, before he can act.' (Id., 43.)

"Thus, none of the questions arising out of this article of the Constitution are committed to the courts for decision. And not being so committed, this court itself holds that they must be determined either by Congress or by such agency as Congress may designate for that purpose. If an agency so designated by Congress makes a mistake, the remedy is stated in the case above referred to to be as follows:

"'Undoubtedly, if the President in exercising this power shall fall into error, or invade the rights of the people of the State, it would be in the power of Congress to apply the proper remedy. But the courts must administer the law as they find it.' (Id., 45.)

"These rules of law have never been departed from. They have been quite recently reiterated in Pacific Telephone Co. v. Oregon (223 U. S., 118). In the cases of State of Mississippi v. Johnson (4 Wall., 475) and State of Georgia v. Stanton (6 Wall., 50) certain acts of Congress establishing provisional governments for the States of Mississippi and Georgia following the Civil War were assailed upon the ground that their effect was to absolutely destroy the State governments of those States. In both cases, however, it was held that the court could not determine the questions raised, because they were not justiciable but were political and directly within the province of Congress to determine.

"Again, the Constitution prescribes the qualifications which shall be possessed by the Members of Congress but makes each House the judge of the qualifications and election of its own Members. A House of Congress may expel a Member on the ground that he is disqualified, and this conclusively determines that he does not possess the qualifications named in the Constitution. It may refuse to accept a Member for a reason which the Constitution does not make a disqualification. It may decide that one man has been elected a Member when the courts would hold that another has been elected. But no one would say that any court could review its action. The result of such action might be considered to deny a man a right given him by the Constitution, or to deny the people of a district or a State the right to be represented by the man of their choice. But whether there has been such a denial of rights must, of course, be determined by some authority, and that authority the Constitution has declared to be Congress and not the courts.

"Again, the Constitution provides, in effect, that the Congress shall count the votes cast for President and Vice President and determine the result. There is nothing in the Constitution which, in terms, says that this decision by Congress shall be final. But it would be scarcely claimed that the courts could be called on to assume jurisdiction and review that decision. Only once in the history of the country has it happened that there has been a serious controversy over the election of a President. In that instance Congress created a special tribunal, unknown to the Constitution, by which the disputed questions were determined and on whose report Congress announced the result of the election. Whatever doubts may have existed as to the constitutionality of this procedure, it was never supposed that this question was one to be determined by the courts.

"The Constitution contains some very specific provisions as to the manner in which acts of Congress shall be passed. It does not, in terms, say that Congress shall be the judge of whether an act has been passed in accordance with these provisions. In the absence of such a declaration, some might suppose that before a court could interpret an act of Congress it might first be called upon to determine whether the act had been passed in the manner required by the Constitution. But this court has always decided otherwise, holding that Congress was the judge, and that its determination that an act had been passed is final and conclusive. The result is that when an act has been signed by the Speaker of the House, the Presiding Officer of the Senate, approved by the President, and deposited with the Secretary of State there is a final determination that it has been passed in accordance with the Constitution, and the courts can not look to the Journals or other documentary evidence and determine that it was not constitutionally passed, or even that, as signed by the presiding officers and the President, it was not, in fact, the bill that passed. (Field v. Clark, 143 U. S., 649, 680; Harwood v. Wentworth, 162 U. S., 547, 562; Flint v. Stone Tracy Co., 220 U. S., 108, 143.)

"Section 5 of Article I provides that a majority of each House of Congress shall constitute a quorum to do business. Less than a majority, therefore, of either House has no constitutional authority to transact business. Perhaps a majority of all acts passed by either House of Congress are passed without a roll call or a record showing the number of votes cast. It is known to everyone at all familiar with congressional procedure that very often each House proceeds to transact business and enact laws as to which a roll call is not necessary when very much less than a majority of Members are present. Such acts, however, are signed by the presiding officers, approved by the President, and deposited with the Secretary of State.

"In many cases it could doubtless be proved beyond a doubt that a quorum was not present when the act was passed. Yet no one would insist that a court could hear such evidence and from it determine that the act had not been passed as required by the Constitution. The reason is that, whether correctly or erroneously, the question has been decided by the branch of the Government to which, by necessary implication, the Constitution has committed it. Even where there has been a roll call on the passage of a bill, and even if we assume that the court could look to the Journal and, from the recorded roll call, determine that an act duly signed and deposited was not, in fact, passed, there might be a case in which the Journal, in fact, did not record the truth. It might be that enough Members who had voted against the act have been, either by mistake or intention, recorded as voting for it to change the result. In such cases it would be easy to prove by the Members themselves that the record did not speak the truth. No court, however, would receive such evidence, for the reason that Congress, in approving its Journal, has decided that question and its decision is binding on the courts.

"Many other instances could be cited of provision in the Constitution which give rise to questions the determination of which is committed wholly and finally to the political branch of the Government and which can never be the subject of judicial inquiry. When the right to determine a question is not, in express terms, conferred upon the political branch of the Government, there may always be some ground for the contention that it is intended to be left within the jurisdiction of the courts. Even in such cases, however, the jurisdiction does not exist when the right of the political branch is necessarily implied in the Constitution. But when the question is expressly committed to Congress there can scarcely be room for argument. The question of what amendments may be proposed by Congress and ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States clearly falls within the latter class, because the right and power to propose amendments exist, according to the very letter of the Constitution, whenever two-thirds of both Houses of Congress deem it necessary to propose them. The proposal, by the required vote, of an amendment is a determination that the necessity exists, and is, therefore, a constitutional exertion of power which the courts are without authority to review. So far, then, as the objections to this amendment based upon its nature are concerned they present, in the strictest sense of the word, questions which are political and not justiciable.

"The question as to whether the ratification of an amendment by a legislature is subject to the referendum feature of a State constitution is not, in express terms, committed to the Congress. In practice, however, the political branch of the Government has always determined when an amendment has been ratified as required by the Constitution, and this court has never reviewed such a decision, although it was once urged to do so. (Myers v. Anderson, 238 U. S., 368, 373–374.)

"But, since the Constitution designates the legislatures of the several States as ratifying agents, the question, in the last analysis, is what body in a particular State constitutes the legislature of that State? This, as held in Luther against Borden, supra, is a question which Congress must determine, either acting itself or through such instrumentality as it may designate. If the question in a particular State was as to which of two bodies of representatives, each claiming to be elected, was the real legislature, there could be no doubt that the determination of that question by Congress would be conclusive. If an effort should be made to show that a majority of the members of a legislature in a particular State which had ratified an amendment were disqualified or not elected, no one would contend that this court would assume jurisdiction of the controversy. Likewise the question is political when it is whether the legislature of a State consists of two houses of representatives, or of those two houses plus all the people of the State. The ascertainment by Congress in the manner prescribed by it forecloses the question of whether ratification has been had by the proper body.

"The adoption of the original Constitution was purely a political act. No provision for a judicial ascertainment of the adoption was provided. The adoption of an amendment to that Constitution is equally a political act, and the courts have been given no part in the proceeding by which amendments may be adopted. The political branch of the Government must ascertain and determine when an amendment has been adopted. In this case Congress, by statute, has provided that when an amendment shall be proposed, and when the Secretary of State shall have received official notice that the legislatures of three-fourths of the States have ratified it, he shall, by his proclamation, declare such amendment to be a part of the Constitution. Recognizing that the determination of whether a proposed amendment had been ratified belonged to the political branch of the Government, Congress has, by law, established this means of determining it. Under the rule laid down in Luther v. Borden, supra, the Secretary of State, having been directed to issue his proclamation when he has received official notice of ratification by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, must necessarily determine what bodies constitute the legislatures of the ratifying States. And as said again in Luther v. Borden, supra, if he makes a mistake, that mistake may be corrected by Congress, but not by the courts.

"The Secretary of State received official notice that the legislatures of three-fourths of the States had ratified the eighteenth amendment. He thereupon issued his proclamation as required by the act of Congress. Thereafter Congress itself approved his decision by proceeding to legislate in accordance with the provisions of the new amendment. The political branch of the Government has therefore determined that this amendment is now a part of the Constitution. By what authority can the court call this determination into question?

"Ever since the case of Luther v. Borden (7 How., 1, 38–39) it has been the established rule of law that—

"'the political department has always determined whether the proposed constitution or amendment was ratified or not by the people of the State, and the judicial power has followed its decision.'

"In respect to determining questions of policy and adopting or altering constitutions, the American State and Federal Governments are molded upon the same plan. In each the distinction between political and judicial functions is the same. If the courts are to follow the determination by the political branch of the Government on the question as to whether a constitution or amendment has been ratified in the case of State constitutions, there would seem to be no reason why the same rule does not apply to amendments to the Federal Constitution. This has certainly been the practice with respect to other amendments. The question arose on the adoption of the fourteenth amendment. The Legislatures of New Jersey and Ohio at first ratified, and then, before the requisite number of States had ratified, attempted to withdraw their ratification. Both actions by these legislatures were certified to the Secretary of State. Apparently, he did not feel called upon to determine the effect of the attempt of these two States to withdraw their ratification. He therefore issued a proclamation stating the facts, and concluding with the statement that if the resolutions of the Legislatures of Ohio and New Jersey ratifying the amendment were to be deemed as remaining in full force and effect, notwithstanding the subsequent effort to revoke them, the amendment had become a part of the Constitution. (15 Stat., p. 707.)

"Of course, this proclamation could not be construed as a determination by the Secretary of State, for the political branch of the Government, that the amendment had been adopted, for it expressly left that question open. It does not seem to have occurred to anyone, however, that it was a proper question to be submitted to the courts for determination. It was treated as a reference back to Congress for determination. A few days later, Congress adopted a resolution declaring that the necessary number of States had ratified and that the amendment was effective. Thereupon, the Secretary of State issued another proclamation in accordance with the resolution of Congress. (15 Stat., pp. 708, 709, 710, 711.) Thus, the means previously adopted by the Congress for determining, through the political branch of the Government, whether an amendment had been adopted having failed, Congress itself, as the proper political branch of the Government, acted directly and determined the question.

"It may be true that, in order to determine what is the law, the courts must first determine what is the Constitution in the same sense that they determine what is a law enacted by Congress. In the latter case they, of course, inquire into the power of Congress to pass the act; but when that power is found to exist, no inquiry is made as to whether the particular measure is one which, as a matter of policy or judgment, Congress should have passed. It may be conceded that the same inquiry may be made in the case of a constitutional amendment. But when it is ascertained that there is no constitutional provision which prohibits the proposal of such an amendment, and the action of the political branches shows that it has been adopted in accordance with the procedure provided by the Constitution, the inquiry ends.

"The Constitution provides certain procedure both for the enactment of a statute and the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution. In both cases it is competent for the court to inquire whether this constitutional procedure has been resorted to. But in pursuing this inquiry the court comes to certain questions as to which it must accept, without further inquiry, the decision of the political branch of the Government. Thus, when Congress has decided that a constitutional majority has voted for a particular measure the courts are without power to review that decision. There are several other constitutional requirements as to the procedure under which an act may be passed by Congress. But when an act of Congress is signed by the presiding officers of both Houses, approved by the President, and deposited with the Secretary of State, its passage in a constitutional manner is conclusively established—at least, the courts can not inquire into that question. They can not be called on to determine from the Journals of the Houses or from other documentary evidence whether the statute as signed and deposited was, in fact, passed or that it was passed in the manner required, or even that, as signed, it contained provisions which were not in it when passed.

"In the same way the Constitution provides that an amendment proposed by Congress must be ratified by the legislatures of a given number of States. When an amendment has been, therefore, regularly proposed by Congress, and when the Secretary of State has received official notice that it has been ratified by the required number of legislatures and has proclaimed it to be a part of the Constitution, the political branch of the Government has recognized it as a validly adopted amendment and the courts must follow that decision. They can no more go behind it and undertake to determine for themselves whether the body which ratified it for the people of a particular State was, in fact, the legislature of that State than they can go behind an act regularly signed by the presiding officers of both Houses, approved by the President, and deposited with the Secretary of State, and decide for themselves whether the act, in fact, passed by a constitutional majority, or even whether it was altered after its passage and before being signed. In both cases the court takes the law or amendment as the political branch of the Government has certified it, and the judicial function then is merely one of interpretation and application.

"In other words, the political branch of the Government is the lawmaking branch. That branch of the Government makes the statute law. It likewise performs the functions necessary to make that part of the law which, by amendment, is engrafted upon the Constitution. In both cases the courts take the law as it comes from the lawmaking branch. That branch having determined that the eighteenth amendment has been ratified, the courts must accept its decision, and the judicial function is merely one of interpretation and application.

"It is respectfully submitted, therefore, that the contention that, under the constitution of any State, the act of its legislature in ratifying an amendment to the Constitution of the United States is subject to a referendum vote by the people presents no justiciable question.

"III.—The contentions against the validity of the eighteenth amendment are all unsound.

"Regardless of where the authority to decide them is vested, the contentions against the validity of the eighteenth amendment are without merit. The amendment is within the amending power. It was proposed because two-thirds of the Members of Congress deemed it necessary to do so, and has been ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States.

"There is nothing in the nature of the eighteenth amendment which takes it out of the amending power conferred by Article V of the Constitution.

"The argument against the eighteenth amendment based upon its nature seems to be threefold:

"(1) It is not an amendment, but mere legislation.

"(2) If an amendment, it is not germane to anything in the Constitution.

"(3) It confers upon Congress certain powers previously reserved to the States, and this can not be done by an amendment in the manner provided in Article V.

"The eighteenth amendment, establishing a fundamental rule of law, is an amendment within the meaning of Article V.

"It is insisted that the eighteenth amendment is in no proper or constitutional sense an amendment, but that it is mere legislation enacted under the guise of an amendment. The contention is that a constitution, as the word was understood in 1789, is 'the form of government, the distribution of the powers of government, and the regulation of the exercise thereof which make up "the constitution of civil government" of the United States.' In describing what the Constitution did, counsel say:

"'The Constitution which was agreed upon and proposed granted enlarged powers to the Government of the Union. It distributed those powers and directed how they should be exercised. It imposed limitations upon the powers granted and upon the powers reserved for the protection of those inalienable rights to secure which governments are instituted.'

"So far as this particular objection is concerned, it is conceded that a constitutional amendment which merely conferred upon Congress the power to regulate or prohibit the liquor traffic would be an amendment. It is said, however, that because the amendment goes further and declares that the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors shall be unlawful, it loses its character as an amendment and becomes merely an act of legislation. The second section of the eighteenth amendment, which merely conferred additional powers upon Congress, is not, therefore, subject to this objection. The objection is directed at the prohibition contained in the first section.

"The definition of the Constitution, as insisted on, is faulty, because the office of the Constitution is not only to provide the machinery of government but to establish fundamental rules of law which shall control all the agencies of the Government. But this amendment comes clearly within even the narrow definition suggested, as counsel say the original Constitution granted enlarged powers to the Government and distributed those powers and directed how they should be exercised, and imposed limitations both upon the powers granted to the Federal Government and the powers reserved to the States. In so far as this amendment confers additional powers of legislation upon Congress, it follows in the footsteps of the framers of the Constitution by granting enlarged powers to the Federal Government. In so far as the powers thus granted are taken from the States, it merely operates to change the original distribution of power. True, the first section of the amendment establishes a rule of law by which the liquor traffic for beverage purposes is made unlawful. But, as shown above, the effect of this is merely to place a limitation upon the powers of the States or of Congress to legislate with respect to that traffic. Prior to its adoption, within their respective spheres, Congress and the States had unlimited power over this traffic. The amendment simply says that hereafter all legislation on that subject shall be subject to the limitation that the traffic for beverage purposes is unlawful. The amendment, therefore, does nothing except what counsel themselves say the original Constitution did.

"The Constitution and the amendments heretofore adopted are full of rules of law by which the activities of the various agencies of government, both State and Federal, and the rights and duties of persons are fixed or regulated.

"Thus it defines the crime of treason in precisely the same language which might have been employed by Congress for the same purpose if the framers of the Constitution had not decided to legislate on that subject themselves. It adds legislation to the effect that 'no person shall be convicted of treason unless on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act, or on confession in open court.' It provides that 'no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attained,' and having itself legislated thus far, empowered Congress 'to declare the punishment of treason.' Here a rule of law governing the conduct of individuals is established. Certain acts are made unlawful and declared to constitute the crime of treason. The Constitution creates the offense and leaves to Congress only the power to fix the punishment, and that only within prescribed limitations. The eighteenth amendment creates another offense and gives Congress the power to fix the punishments. Treason is a crime against the Government. But so is any other violation of a criminal law. Both relate to the conduct of individuals. They differ only in the degree of heinousness. The declaration that 'full faith and credit shall be given in each State to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other State' establishes a rule of law just as does the first section of the eighteenth amendment. And the provision that 'the Congress may by general laws prescribe the manner in which such acts, records, and proceedings shall be proved, and the effect thereof,' like the second section of the eighteenth amendment, confers the power of legislation to enforce. That 'the citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States' is merely a law which the framers of the Constitution might have empowered Congress to make, but decided to make themselves. The same is true of the provision that persons charged with crime in one State and fleeing into another shall be delivered up and removed to the State having jurisdiction of the crime. The Constitution also contains an explicit provision for the return to the owner of a fugitive slave.

"That the provisions referred to are acts of legislation in the sense that they establish rules of law can not be doubted. They and other provisions constitute a body of laws which the framers of the Constitution deemed of such importance that they should be enacted and placed beyond the control of any branch of the Government. Primarily the idea was that the purpose of the convention was not only to create the necessary machinery for a Government, but to make those fundamental laws which were deemed necessary if the Government in its operation was to serve the desired purpose. Whatever rule of law, therefore, was considered of sufficient importance, whether it related to the conduct of Government or to the conduct of citizens, was put in the Constitution, and, subject to these rules of law, the legislative power of the Government was vested in Congress. The Constitution, then, being an instrument providing the machinery of Government and the fundamental laws by which that Government should be controlled, is subject to amendment either for the purpose of changing the machinery of Government, the distribution of power, or the fundamental rules of law.

"It is difficult to see how any provision which, in accordance with what was done, might, with entire propriety, have been put in the original Constitution, can not now be put there by amendment. In connection with the privisions of the Constitution above referred to, there would have been nothing inappropriate or incongruous in a provision to the effect that the liquor traffic should be unlawful throughout the United States. The Constitution did, in effect, make the importation of slaves lawful for a fixed period, if permitted by any State. It can scarcely be doubted that if the framers of the Constitution had seen fit to insert what was afterwards put into the thirteenth amendment, and thus prohibit slavery, this would have been an entirely appropriate constitutional provision.

"What has been said is but a statement of the ideas that have prevailed in proposing and ratifying all the amendments which have been heretofore adopted. The first amendment is in form a limitation upon the power of Congress, but it establishes as a matter of right and law religious freedom, and the freedom of speech and the press, and makes it the law of the land that people may peaceably assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances. Nobody questions, of course, the validity of this amendment, but would it have been any more legislation if it had provided that the doctrines of the Methodist Church shall be the established religion, or that Congress should not abridge the freedom of speech except in a certain specified class of cases?

"The second amendment is simply an act of legislation to the effect that the people shall have the right to keep and bear arms. Its nature as an amendment would have been no different if it had provided that the people should not keep and bear arms except under specified conditions.

"The third amendment prohibits, in the time of peace, the quartering of soldiers in any house without the consent of the owner. While this prohibition is effective primarily against the Government, the prohibition of the eighteenth amendment operates practically to prohibit both the Federal and State Governments from legalizing the liquor traffic.

"The fourth amendment secures the people against unreasonable searches and seizures. It is couched in language entirely suitable to a legislative enactment.

"The fifth amendment, prescribing the rights to which an accused in a criminal case shall be entitled, operates, it is true, as a limitation upon the powers of the Government, but at the same time it makes general laws which every individual is entitled to invoke for his protection. The same is true of the sixth amendment.

"The seventh amendment prescribes the cases in which litigants shall be entitled to a trial by jury and makes the rules of the common law controlling in the reexamination by any court of the United States of a fact tried by a jury, precisely as Congress could have done in enacting a statute.

"The eighth amendment prohibits excessive bail, excessive fines, or cruel or unusual punishment. Congress, of course, had the power prior to this amendment to prescribe what bail should be required, what fines imposed, and what punishments inflicted in criminal cases. The effect of this amendment was merely to place a limitation upon that power, just as the effect of section 1 of the eighteenth amendment is to place a limitation upon the power of Congress and the States in dealing with the liquor traffic.

"When we come to the thirteenth amendment we have the exact prototype of the eighteenth amendment. It is that—

"'Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States, or any place subject to their jurisdiction.'

"This is legislation in every sense in which the eighteenth amendment can be said to be legislation. It prohibits slavery or involuntary servitude throughout the United States just as the eighteenth amendment prohibits the liquor traffic. It placed a limitation upon the power of both Congress and the States to legislate on the subject of slavery or involuntary servitude just as the eighteenth amendment places a similar restriction upon legislation on the subject of intoxicating liquor. It operates, however, just as the eighteenth amendment does, not only as a limitation upon the powers of government but equally as a rule of conduct governing individuals. It was directed primarily at African slavery; but is, by no means, confined to that subject. Any individual who holds any other individual in involuntary servitude violates the prohibition just as persons who sell or transport intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes violate the eighteenth amendment. The thirteenth amendment, like the eighteenth, confers upon Congress the power to legislate for its enforcement. Under this power Congress has enacted the peonage law, under which any individual, anywhere in the United States, who holds another in involuntary servitude is subject to be punished.

"Thus, in framing both the original Constitution and the various amendments thereto, there has always been kept in mind the purpose to include in the fundamental law those rules or principles of law for the conduct of the Government and for controlling the conduct of individuals which were deemed of sufficient importance to put beyond the power of Congress or legislatures to change. The eighteenth amendment is in accord with this purpose. If it is not an amendment, the thirteenth was equally not an amendment. If the liquor traffic can not be prohibited by a constitutional amendment, then slavery has not been prohibited, and the Government of the United States is without power to prohibit it.

"An amendment necessarily operates as a change, either by addition, subtraction, or substitution. If it is made, there is necessarily either something in the instrument amended which was not there before or something has been stricken out. It is said, however, that an amendment in the constitutional sense must be deemed to be for the purpose of correcting something which experience has shown should be corrected. This statement, however, throws but little light on the controversy. If the Constitution needs correction, it is because there is something in it which under existing conditions is not necessary, or because changed conditions have made something necessary which was omitted when it was adopted. An amendment which accomplishes either of these purposes serves to make a correction. It is said, however, that the amendment to be valid must be germane to something already in the Constitution. If this be assumed, as we have before shown, the Congress itself and the ratifying legislatures have been made the judges of whether a proposed amendment is germane, and their decision is final. Moreover, if the proposed amendment is something which might have been inserted in the original draft of the Constitution, although dealing with a subject not then thought necessary to be mentioned, it will be, of course, germane as an amendment.

"Counsel have quoted rules of various assemblies, going back to the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and soon thereafter, providing in effect that a pending motion or bill should not, under the guise of amendment, have substituted for it an entirely new motion or bill or one dealing with an entirely new subject. In other words, it is shown that legislative assemblies have found it necessary to limit the right of amendment to the making of such amendments as deal with matters germane to the subject of the original bill or motion. The inference, however, is against, rather than in favor of, the contention of the appellants. Clearly it is to be inferred that the word 'amendment,' as ordinarily understood, is broad enough to include any sort of alteration or change. For this reason, to secure the orderly consideration of business, legislative bodies find it necessary to limit the kind of amendments that may be considered. The Constitution, however, in providing for amendments imposes no such restriction and the word 'amendment' must be given its ordinary meaning.

"Anything added to a pending bill is, in the ordinary acceptation of the word, an amendment. Long ago one of the vices of American legislation came to be the practice of incorporating, by way of amendments, all sorts of unrelated matters in one act. In order to avoid this Congress found it necessary to adopt rules requiring amendments to be germane. And many States adopted constitutional provisions to the effect that no bill shall contain more than one subject; that subject to be stated in the title. In the absence, however, of a constitutional mandate prohibiting certain amendments, when a provision is passed as an amendment it can not be assailed as not germane.

"That Article V provided for the proposal of any amendment, with the two exceptions named, which two-thirds of the Members of both Houses should deem it necessary to propose, was the meaning which the Constitution was understood to have at the time of its adoption and during the period immediately following. This understanding was that any changes which experience should show to be desirable could thus be made in the Constitution. Washington in his first message to Congress, speaking of the subject of constitutional amendments, said:

"'Besides the ordinary objects submitted to your care, it will remain with your judgment to decide how far an exercise of the occasional power delegated by the fifth article of the Constitution is rendered expedient at the present juncture by the nature of objections which have been urged against the system, or by the degree of inquietude which has given birth to them.'

"And referring to the considerations which should control Congress in the matter of proposing amendments, he added:

"'For I assure myself that, whilst you carefully avoid every alteration which might endanger the benefits of a united and effective government or which ought to await the future lessons of experience, a reverence for the characteristic rights of freemen and a regard for the public harmony will sufficiently influence your deliberations on the question how far the former can be more impregnably fortified or the latter be safely and advantageously promoted.' (Washington's Writings, Vol. XII, pp. 4, 5.)

"And in his Farewell Address he said:

"'This Government, the offspring of our own choice, uninfluenced and unawed, adopted upon full investigation and mature deliberation, completely free in its principles, in the distribution of its powers, uniting security with energy, and containing within itself a provision for its own amendment, has a just claim to your confidence and your support. Respect for its authority, compliance with its laws, acquiescence in its measures, are duties enjoined by the fundamental maxims of true liberty. The basis of our political systems is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government.' (Id., p. 222.)

"Clearly his idea was that any alterations found necessary by the amending agency would be within the amending power.

"When the first 10 amendments were under consideration in Congress there was extended debate, but throughout all that was said there was no suggestion that there was any limitation upon the character of changes or additions which might be made under the authority of Article V, with the two exceptions named in that article. The prevailing idea was expressed by Mr. Gerry when he said:

"'It is said that the present form of the amendments is contrary to the fifth article. I will not undertake to define the etxent of the word amendment, as it stands in the fifth article; but I suppose if we proposed to change the division of the powers given to the three branches of the Government, and that proposition is accepted and ratified by three-fourths of the State legislatures, it will become as valid, to all intents and purposes, as any part of the Constitution; but if it is the opinion of gentlemen that the original is to be kept sacred, amendments will be of no use and had better be omitted.' (Seaton & Gale's Annals of Congress, Vol. I, p. 712.)

"The fact that the eighteenth amendment confers upon Congress a power which had previously belonged exclusively to the States does not prevent that amendment from being within the amending power conferred by Article V of the Constitution.

"It is next insisted that the eighteenth amendment is invalid because the amending power conferred by Article V can not be invoked to take from a State, without its consent, any of the powers previously reserved to the State by the Constitution. This argument rests upon the assumption that in some way the Constitution has placed what are termed the police powers, or powers of local economy of the State, beyond the reach of the amending power. No language can be found in the Constitution discriminating between amendments which withdraw from the States powers previously reserved to them and other amendments. In the absence of such language it is difficult to see how such a distinction can be inferred when we consider the nature of the Constitution and that which was accomplished by its adoption.

"The reason for forming the Union and adopting the Constitution was the necessity for a General Government which could, in the very nature of things, exercise certain powers of government for the benefit of all the people better than those powers could be exercised by the several States. It was essential that such a government should have the powers necessary to accomplish the purpose of its creation. The powers of sovereignty resting in the people were exercised through the agency of the various State governments. It was necessary in order to create an effective central government that some of the powers theretofore exercised through the State governments should be conferred upon the central government. This could not be accomplished except by a surrender on the part of the people of each State of the right to exercise those powers through the State governments. The Constitution of the United States, when adopted, was the creature not of the State governments but of the people of the United States. Its adoption was the result of an agreement between the peoples of the several States, constituting the people of the United States, as to the distribution of the powers of government between the Federal Government and the several State governments. The new government was thus created by drawing on the several States for the necessary powers.

"After the adoption of the Constitution the States remained sovereign States, but they and their people had voluntarily denuded themselves of many of the powers of complete sovereignty. The exercise of some of these powers was, in express terms, denied to the States. Many other powers were taken from the States because they were conferred upon the Federal Government. It was a matter of judgment as to what powers should be left to be exercised by State governments or reserved to the people, and what ought to be conferred upon the Federal Government. It may be assumed that the framers of the Constitution divided the powers of government between the States and the Federal Government in the manner they then believed to be necessary. They recognized, however, that, as time went on, experience might show that the Constitution would be improved by changing the distribution of powers as then made. For this reason they inserted Article V, providing for amendments. One of the chief subjects of consideration at that time was this question of the distribution of power. If it had been intended, therefore, that any of the powers then reserved should never be taken from the States without unanimous consent, language would undoubtedly have been used to express that intent. In the very nature of things almost any amendment that could be adopted would take either from the States or the Federal Government some of the powers belonging to them respectively.

"Under the original Constitution there is nothing to indicate an intention that amendments should be confined to one class. Maifestly the purpose was to provide for the making of amendments of either class, as experience might dictate. It is utterly inconceivable that it should have been intended that an amendment could be adopted which would take away from the Federal Government any of the powers then conferred, but that it should be impossible to amend the Constitution by conferring a power found by experience to be necessary. The people of the various States were secured against hasty amendments or amendments that might injuriously affect the powers of State governments by the provisions of Article V. No amendment could be proposed unless agreed to by two-thirds of the Members of Congress, the Members of both branches of which represented the peoples of the various States, and in one branch of which the representatives of each State had an equal suffrage. With the right of amendment thus hedged about, and with the power in the people of a small minority of the States to prevent any amendment, it was not deemed necessary to place any restrictions upon the amending power, except the two expressly stated, or to place any particular powers of the State governments beyond its reach. As said by Mr. Justice Brewer in Kansas v. Colorado (206 U. S., 46, 90):

"'The people who adopted the Constitution knew that in the nature of things they could not foresee all the questions which might arise in the future, all the circumstances which might call for the exercise of further national powers than those granted to the United States, and after making provision for an amendment to the Constitution by which any needed additional powers would be granted they reserved to themselves all powers not so delegated.'

"Article V makes two exceptions to the amending power, one temporary and one permanent. This enumeration of exceptions, under well-recognized rules of construction, excludes the idea that any other exception was intended. This alone would be a complete answer to the present contention, but the fallacy of the argument is put beyond peradventure when we find that at the time Article V was under consideration in the Constitutional Convention it was twice proposed to insert a provision that no State should without its consent 'be affected in its internal police,' and the proposition was twice rejected by the convention. (Vol. 1, Elliott's Debates, pp. 316–317; and Madison's Papers, pp. 531–532 and 551–552.) Judged, then, both by the language employed and that which was deliberately rejected, it would seem that the true intent of Article V has been accurately stated by a text writer, thus: 'In scope the amending power is now limited as to but one subject, namely, the equal representation of the States in the Senate.' (Willoughby on Constitution, sec. 227.)

"This conclusion is in accord with the practice since the beginning of the Government. That amendments to the Constitution have taken from the States power theretofore considered as relating to their internal affairs and constituting a part of their police powers is perfectly evident. It is true that at the time the Constitution was adopted there was in some quarters a feeling that too much power had been conferred upon the Federal Government or that the powers so conferred would be abused. It was therefore not unnatural that the first 10 amendments, proposed almost immediately after the adoption of the Constitution, should be not for the purpose of enlarging the Federal powers but for either placing restrictions upon them or clearly interpreting them. But when the time came that existing conditions required an extension of the powers of the Federal Government and a greater curtailment of the powers of the States, this end was, without question, accomplished through amendments made in accordance with Article V.

"At the time the Constitution was adopted it can not be doubted that, in those States in which slavery existed, the right to control that institution was a matter of chief concern to their people. Nobody doubted that it was a domestic matter subject to the police powers of the States as they then existed. The purpose to continue State control of it was so determined that Article V was adopted only when a provision was inserted, the effect of which was to preserve the safeguards of this control to the States until 1808 as against any amendment that could be made. Slavery, in fact, was the only matter of local concern which received special attention in the Constitution. But when the time came that the sentiment of the people of the United States demanded that slavery should no longer exist, the desired end was accomplished by the adoption of the thirteenth amendment. It is no answer to say that slavery had already been abolished by the emancipation proclamation of the President. As a war measure, it may be assumed that proclamation did free the slaves which were then held in the States whose people were in arms against the Government. It did not, however, emancipate any slaves, if there were any, held in States which were then loyal to the Union or which were not mentioned in the proclamation. It certainly would not have operated to prevent any form of involuntary servitude which any State might have seen fit to permit after the restoration of the Union. It may be that it would not have been practicable thereafter to reestablish, to any considerable extent, African slavery, but the right of the States to permit involuntary servitude had not been taken away. The thirteenth amendment was necessary to accomplish this, for, as stated above, the prohibition of that amendment is not confined to African slavery but applies to any form of involuntary servitude not penal. Certainly there is no difference between the reserved right of the States to regulate the subject of slavery and the reserved rights of the same States to regulate the liquor traffic. Both are domestic or internal matters in the same sense. An amendment to the Constitution applicable to one is on all fours with an amendment applicable to the other.

"The fourteenth amendment invaded the previously reserved governmental rights of the States with respect to a number of matters, including the right to provide for due process of law or to prescribe unequal protection of the laws. It fettered the States in the power to legislate or act in respect to individual rights of citizens or persons where before it had such power. It divested each State of powers which under the tenth amendment had been reserved to the State.

"When the Constitution was adopted, the right to prescribe who should be voters was exclusively a State matter. The qualifications of voters in the several States differed widely. (Minor v. Happersett, 21 Wall., 162, 172.) The fourteenth amendment, as construed by this Court, left each State still in control of the power to say who should be its voters. The fifteenth amendment, however, directly restrains the right of the States to regulate suffrage not only as to national elections but as to strictly internal elections.

"By the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments it can not be doubted that the police and other powers previously belonging to the States were greatly curtailed. Yet, in each instance, there was no infringement of the rights of the States under the Constitution. By procedure had in accordance with the express authority given by the people, each State acting separately, either by the ratification of the Constitution or by later acceding to it, a change was made by which further power was delegated to the Federal Government. The mandate of the tenth amendment was not violated, but was observed. The only powers of which a State was in this way deprived were powers which are by the Constitution expressly conferred upon the United States. This is true because Article V expressly enacts that an amendment proposed and ratified as therein provided 'shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of this Constitution.'

"It is respectfully submitted that unless the course previously pursued in securing amendments of the Constitution can be said to be unconstitutional and void there is no valid objection to the eighteenth amendment upon the ground that it takes from the States any of their reserved powers.

"IV.—No State, by any provision of its laws or its constitution, can make the ratification of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States by its legislature subject to a referendum vote of the people.

"Some of the States whose legislatures ratified the eighteenth amendment have, in their constitutions, referendum features under which the acts of their legislatures are not final until after the lapse of a fixed time, during which, if a petition bearing the required number of names is presented, such acts are to be submitted to a vote of the people for approval or disapproval. In only one of the States (Ohio) is this provision of the Constitution, in express terms, made applicable to the ratification of amendments to the Federal Constitution. In some, the referendum is provided for in language concededly not broad enough to include such an act of ratification. In others, however, it is claimed that, though such amendments are not expressly mentioned, language sufficiently broad to include them has been used. It is not necessary to go into the details of these various State constitutions. It is admitted that the controversy exists with respect to enough of the ratifying States to at least delay the ratification of the amendment to a period some months later than the date for which we contend, if the appellant's contention should be sustained. The question, therefore, as to the effect of a State constitutional provision making the ratification of a Federal amendment subject to a referendum vote must now be determined, if not, as hereinabove contended, a question as to which the courts are bound by the decision of the political branch of the Government.

"We insist that appellant's position is unsound. Article V of the Constitution provides that amendments, when proposed, shall become effective when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the States, or by conventions held in three-fourths of the States, if Congress shall see fit to propose the amendments to such conventions instead of the legislature. No reference is made to a vote of any kind by the people. The only method of ratification mentioned is through representatives assembled either in the legislature or in a convention called for that purpose. In other words, it is clearly contemplated that the action of the State in ratifying shall not be by direct vote of the people, but by their representatives; and the body, or bodies, who shall be recognized as acting for the States are specifically named. The sole part assigned to the people of a particular State in the ratification of an amendment is that they are to elect the representatives who shall be authorized to act for them. If Congress sees fit to propose an amendment to conventions to be called with authority to ratify, the people elect representatives authorized to act for them in that matter. Congress may, however, see fit to make the proposal to those in whom the people have had sufficient confidence to select to represent them in all matters of State legislation. When the people, therefore, elect members of the legislature, they do so with the full knowledge that those representatives will be authorized to act for them not only with respect to State legislation, but also with respect to the ratification of any amendment which Congress may propose to the legislature. Members of the legislature, therefore, are necessarily elected with a view to having them act on any Federal amendment proposed.

"The language used in Article V has been construed to express an explicit intention to exclude direct action of the people from participation in the ratification of an amendment. Thus in Dodge v. Woolsey (18 How., 331, 348), speaking of the Constitution, it was said:

"'It is supreme over the people of the United States, aggregately and in their separate sovereignties, because they have excluded themselves from any direct or immediate agency in making amendments to it, and have directed that amendments should be made representatively for them, by the Congress of the United States, when two-thirds of both Houses shall propose them; or where the legislatures of two-thirds of the several States shall call a convention for proposing amendments, which, in either case, become valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the Constitution, when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States, or by conventions in three-fourths of them, as one or the other mode of ratification may be proposed by Congress.'

"When the Constitution was adopted there was in every State a representative body to which the term 'legislature' was applicable. There was no misunderstanding or difference of opinion as to what was meant by a legislature. It was this representative lawmaking body in each State. Nothing has occurred since to give the word a different meaning. No State has abolished its representative lawmaking body. In every State in the Union to-day there is just such a body. The States which have adopted the referendum plan have not attempted to abolish their legislatures. Indeed, the very form of the referendum provisions of State constitutions retains the legislature as a separate and distinct body. Usually, these provisions provide that the legislative power of the State shall be vested in a legislature. They then, in effect, retain a veto power in the people by providing that the action of the legislature shall not be final, but shall be subject, under certain conditions, to be submitted to a vote of the people for approval or disapproval. Under this system, however, the legislature, as a distinct feature of State government, exists and functions precisely as it did at the time the Constitution was adopted. The only difference is that the people have reserved to themselves a means for undoing what the legislature has done. If this means is not resorted to, the action of the legislature becomes effective just as it has always done. True, a limitation has been placed upon its power, and, in a sense, it may be said that it is not now invested with all the legislative power of the State. This power may be said to be divided between the legislature and the people. From this it is argued that in the referendum States the people are now a part of the legislature.

"This, however, does violence to the very language of the referendum provisions of State constitutions, which, instead of changing the nature of a legislature, merely reserves to the people the right to nullify its action. No court, so far as we know, has ever said that, in such States, the people are a part of the legislature and, in effect, constitute a third house. To so say would be an anachronism, for a house or a legislature is, in the very essence of the term, a representative body and not a mass meeting. It is a body of men assembled for joint action as representatives and not an election held at the polls in each civil district. The expression that the people constitute a third house of the legislature, if its use is admissible at all, is merely a figurative expression, and merely means that the people, by their votes at the polls, have the power to render ineffective action taken by the legislature. The expression is used in the same sense that we sometimes speak of the trial judge as a thirteenth juror, because, in passing on a motion for a new trial, he considers the evidence previously submitted to the jury. No one means by this, however, that he is really a juror. It simply means that, in his capacity as judge, he must perform, with respect to the evidence in a case, much the same function which a juror performs in originally passing upon it. So it may be said that in the referendum States the people at the polls perform much the same function that the legislature has previously performed in enacting laws. No one, however, intending to speak accurately, would say that in performing this function the people of the State constituted either a legislature or a part of a legislature. The main idea of a legislature is a deliberative body acting collectively and under responsibility to the people. In a referendum the voters act separately, not as a deliberative body, and without any responsibility to any further power.

"So far as a legislature derives its power to act from the people of a State, it is not denied that the people may limit or restrict its powers by an initiative or referendum feature of the constitution, or otherwise as they see fit. But in ratifying an amendment to the Federal Constitution, the several legislatures exercise a power derived from the people of the United States through the Constitution of the United States. It can not be claimed that a State constitution could withhold from the legislature the power to ratify an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and provide that the people alone should pass on it. This power can not be abrogated, restricted, or altered in any way save by the authority of the people of the United States, from whom it was derived. It is wholly beyond the control, in any respect, of the people of a single State.

"The legislatures of the several States draw power, as such bodies, from the Federal Constitution in many instances which the States could not change or modify by local laws or constitutions.

"Prior to the recent amendment, the Senators for each State were to be chosen by the legislatures; the time, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives are to be prescribed in each State by the legislature, subject, however, to the control of Congress. 'Each State shall appoint, in such manner as the legislatures thereof may direct,' presidential electors. New States can not be formed by the junction of two or more States, or parts of States, without the sanction of the legislatures of the States concerned. When performing any function above mentioned, the legislature derives its authority not from the constitution of the State but from the Constitution of the United States. The source of this authority is not the people of a single State, but the whole people of the United States. It can be abrogated or modified only by the same authority. And, through the adoption of Article V, the people of the United States have determined that the only means of accomplishing such abrogation or modification shall be the adoption of an amendment to the Federal Constitution. That the result has been to place the legislature, in this respect, beyond any restrictions that can be imposed by the State constitutions and to exclude the people from any direct or immediate agency in making amendments unmistakably follows from what has been quoted above from Dodge v. Woolsey.

"In the multiplicity of assaults now being made on the eighteenth amendment it would be surprising to find all the assailants in harmony and not urging conflicting views. It is not strange, therefore, to find in the brief filed in behalf of the State of Rhode Island a clear refutation of the claim that a State constitution may limit the power of a legislature to ratify a Federal amendment. In that brief there is this emphatic disclaimer of any such power in the people of any State:

"'Congress in proposing, and the legislatures in ratifying, an amendment to the Constitution are Federal representatives. They derive all their power and authority from the Constitution. They derive no power from the laws or constitutions of the several States. Congress and the legislatures of the several States were made an amending branch of the Federal Government for the purposes expressed in Article V, and, like other branches of the Federal Government, must find their powers within the Constitution. They act as the representatives of the people of the United States.'

"If this be true, then the people of the several States, having denied themselves direct participation in the adoption of an amendment, and having agreed to act only representatively in that regard, have made the legislatures of the several States, for this purpose, separate and independent agencies of the Federal Government. If, in this regard, the power of the legislature is conferred by the Constitution of the United States, and in no way derived from the States, or, except through that Constitution, from the people of the States, it must be equally true that that power can be curtailed or limited only by the authority from which it was derived—that is, the Constitution of the United States or an amendment thereto.

"As stated above, the legislature is designated by the Constitution, in slightly differing language, to perform the same function in the selection of presidential electors and, before the recent amendment, in the selection of Senators that it performs in ratifying amendments to the Constitution. It is safe to say that, before the adoption of the amendment for the election of United States Senators by the people, it never occurred to anyone that it was within the power of the people of a State to control the legislature in electing a United States Senator by requiring that such election should be subject to a referendum vote. When the sentiment finally prevailed that the people of each State should have the right to control, at the polls, the election of United States Senators, this result was accomplished by the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution. If the same change shall ever be desired with respect to the ratification of Federal amendments, it can be accomplished only in the same way.

"In the case of McPherson v. Blacker (146 U. S., 1), this court had occasion to consider the power of the legislature with respect to the appointment of presidential electors, and the judicial and political history of the country touching the matter of presidential electors was exhaustively reviewed. The views expressed by statesmen and writers at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and since were recalled, and, summing up the result, the court quoted with approval from a report made by Senator Morton, as chairman of the Senate Committee on Privileges and Elections, in 1874, in which it was said:

"'The appointment of these electors is thus placed absolutely and wholly with the legislatures of the several States. They may be chosen by the legislature, or the legislature may provide that they shall be elected by the people of the State at large, or in districts, as are Members of Congress, which was the case formerly in many States; and it is, no doubt, competent for the legislature to authorize the governor, or the supreme court of the State, or any other agent of its will, to appoint these electors. This power is conferred upon the legislatures of the States by the Constitution of the United States, and can not be taken from them or modified by their State constitutions any more than can their power to elect Senators of the United States. Whatever provisions may be made by statute, or by the State constitution, to choose electors by the people, there is no doubt of the right of the legislature to resume the power at any time, for it can neither be taken away nor abdicated.' (Id., p. 34.)

"Obviously, when the people were adopting the Constitution it would have been competent for them to clothe the governor, the supreme court, or any other agency of a State with the power to ratify amendments for and in the name of the people of that State. However, they chose to thus designate the legislature. It follows that the action of the legislatures of three-fourths of the States becomes not alone the action of the people of their respective States, singly or together, but that of the people of the States whose legislatures decline to ratify—all of which people constitute the people of the United States as fully as the several States constitute in their Union the United States of America. That this was clearly understood at the time the first 10 amendments were under consideration by Congress is shown by the debates. Among many similar statements, Mr. Gerry said this:

"'The Constitution of the United States was proposed by a convention met at Philadelphia; but, with all its importance, it did not possess as high authority as the President, Senate, and House of Representatives of the Union. For that convention was not convened in consequence of any express will of the people, but an implied one, through their members in the State legislatures. The Constitution derived no authority from the first convention; it was concurred in by conventions of the people, and that concurrence armed it with power and invested it with dignity. Now, the Congress of the United States are expressly authorized by the sovereign and uncontrollable voice of the people to propose amendments whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall think fit. Now, if this is the fact, the propositions of amendment will be found to originate with a higher authority than the original system. The conventions of the States, respectively, have agreed for the people that the State legislatures shall be authorized to decide upon these amendments in the manner of a convention. If these acts of the State legislatures are not good, because they are not specifically instructed by their constituents, neither were the acts calling the first and subsequent conventions.' (Gales and Seaton's Annals of Congress, vol. 1, p. 716.)

"The case of Davis v. Ohio (241 U. S., 565) is in no way in conflict with what has been said. It involved that provision of the Constitution that—

"'The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the legislature thereof.'

"If this had been all of the provision, the authority of the legislature would have been as complete as it was in the election of Senators or electors and in the ratifying of amendments. This, however, is not all of the provision. It continues—

"'But the Congress may at any time by law make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators.'

"It will thus be seen that the ultimate power in this matter is given to Congress, if it chooses to exert such power. The act of Congress in effect prior to 1911 was that the existing districts in a State should continue in force 'until the legislature of such State in the manner herein prescribed shall redistrict such State.' But a new act was passed by Congress in 1911, which provided that the redistricting should be made by a State 'in the manner provided by the laws thereof.' Since Congress had the ultimate power of control, it could itself make the redistricting or require it to be made in such way as it directed. The court therefore held that the language quoted from the act of 1911 was significant. Previously Congress had simply provided that the redistricting should be done by the legislature. But when this act was passed, various States had adopted referendum amendments, and the court was of the opinion that in using the language 'in the manner provided by the laws thereof' Congress had expressed an intention not to leave the matter absolutely to the legislature, but to place it within the legislative power of the State as determined by its own laws. In the absence of any act of Congress on the subject the legislature having been, in the first instance, designated by the Constitution, could have redistricted the State. And if it had been claimed that its action was subject to the referendum of the State constitution, it might have been a good answer to say that it had performed a function devolved upon it by the Constitution of the United States. But the Constitution gave Congress the power to take this matter out of the hands of the legislature. This court merely held that it had done this and by the language used had indicated an intention that the action of the legislature should be subject to all the restrictions which the constitution of the State imposed with respect to the passage of a law.

"V.—The resolution proposing the eighteenth amendment sufficiently showed that two-thirds of the Members of both Houses deemed its proposal necessary.

"The last objection to the validity of the eighteenth amendment is found in the contention that the resolution proposing and reciting that two-thirds of both Houses concurred is insufficient, because, it is insisted, that to comply with Article V, there must be some express declaration or finding by Congress not merely that two-thirds of the Members concurred, but that two-thirds of the Members of both Houses deem the amendment necessary. The argument in support of this highly technical and rather remarkable contention is based principally upon the claim that when the first 10 amendments were being considered by Congress, almost contemporaneously with the adoption of the Constitution, this was the construction put upon Article V by the statesmen of that day who had helped to frame the Constitution, as evidenced by the form used in proposing these first amendments. In making this argument, however, counsel were misled by Gales and Seaton's 'Annals of Congress,' published in 1834. This work (vol. 1, p. 778) published a resolution containing the recital 'having been agreed to by two-thirds of both Houses,' and, at page 779, that the resolution, as reported by a committee and adopted by the House of Representatives, had changed this language so as to read, 'two-thirds of both Houses deeming it necessary,' and that, at volume 1, page 88, it appeared that the resolution had been adopted by the Senate. From this it was assumed that Congress, in proposing the first 10 amendments, had used the language quoted, and for the reason that this was deemed necessary in order to comply with Article V.

"It is conceded that practically all, if not all, of the amendments subsequent to the tenth have been proposed in a resolution using the exact language used in proposing the eighteenth amendment. They say, however, that this doubtless resulted from the fact that when, in 1845, the first volume of the Statutes at Large of the United States was published, by Messrs. Little & Brown, the resolution proposing the first 10 amendments as there published used simply the expression 'two-thirds of both Houses concurring.' Counsel assumed that this was a mistake made by the publishers, and that this mistake led to what they termed 'the loose practice' which has since prevailed in proposing all amendments. The argument is that in this matter the construction placed upon Article V by those who proposed the first 10 amendments should be given controlling weight. The mistake, however, is in the conclusion drawn from what is found in Gales and Seaton's 'Annals of Congress,' and not in the resolution as published in First Statutes at Large, page 97. The original resolution, as adopted by Congress and signed by John Adams, as Vice President, and by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, is on file in the office of the Secretary of State, and a copy of it is printed as an appendix to this brief. It shows that it was correctly published in the First Statutes at Large. The elaborate argument made, therefore, in support of the contention that the form of the resolution thus adopted by a Congress composed in large part of men who were members of the Constitutional Convention ought to be treated as the only proper and constitutional form becomes an argument against the contention that the eighteenth amendment was not properly proposed.

The argument is based upon another fallacy. It is assumed that before an amendment can be proposed two-thirds of the Members of both Houses shall deem it necessary that such an amendment should become a part of the Constitution. Article V does not say this. It says:

"'The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution.'

"If it had been intended that two-thirds of the members should deem the adoption of the amendment necessary, the language would have been: 'The Congress, whenever two-thirds of both Houses shall deem them necessary, shall propose amendments to this Constitution.' What is required is that they shall deem the proposal of amendments and not their adoption necessary. There may be many reasons why a Member of Congress may honestly deem it necessary to propose an amendment which he himself does not think necessary to be a part of the Constitution. It may be that he represents a constituency which, he is sure, favors and desires such an amendment. It may be that the agitation for an amendment has created such an unsettled condition in the public mind that he deems it necessary to propose an amendment in order that those conditions may be settled.

"Counsel have quoted from the debates in Congress when the eighteenth amendment was pending to show that, for these or similar reasons, Members of Congress voted to propose the amendment, although, as individuals, they were opposed to its adoption. But each Member of Congress is the judge of the reasons which led him to the conclusion that the proposal of a particular amendment is either necessary or unnecessary. The reasons assigned by the Members quoted in the brief do not, therefore, impeach their judgment that it was necessary to propose this amendment. Counsel are fond of appealing to the utterances of distinguished Members of the early Congresses of the United States for a proper interpretation of the Constitution. An examination of the debates in Congress when the first 10 amendments were pending, so far as the reasons leading Members to conclude that the proposal was necessary are concerned, is almost a counterpart of the debates on the eighteenth amendment quoted in the brief. Throughout these debates there was no suggestion that a Member might not, with entire propriety and in entire accord with the Constitution, deem it necessary to propose an amendment the adoption of which he himself did not regard as necessary. Mr. Madison is quoted in Gales and Seaton's 'Annals of Congress' (vol. 1, p. 704), as follows:

"'He would remind gentlemen that there were many who conceived amendments of some kind necessary and proper in themselves; while others who are not so well satisfied of the necessity and propriety may think they are rendered expedient from some other consideration. Is it desirable to keep up a division among the people of the United States on a point in which they consider their most essential rights are concerned? If this is an object worthy the attention of such a numerous part of our constituents, why should we decline taking it into our consideration, and thereby promote that spirit of urbanity and unanimity which the Government itself stands in need of for its more full support?'

"Mr. Clymer is reported, at page 710, as saying:

"'He made this distinction because he did not conceive any of the amendments essential, but as they were solicited by his fellow citizens, and for that reason they were acquiesced in by others, he therefore wished the motion for throwing them into a supplementary form might be carried.'

"The debates are full of similar statements.

"Some of the objections to the validity of the eighteenth amendment which we have previously considered in this brief, if sustained, would invalidate not only that amendment but several others, notably the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth. The present contention, based upon the theory that the language used by Congress in proposing amendments, from the beginning of the Government, does not comply with the provisions of Article V, will enjoy the distinction, if sustained, of destroying every amendment supposed heretofore to have been adopted and of restoring unaltered to its original form the Constitution as it came from the convention in 1789. This simple result is recognized by counsel, and is met by the suggestion that, since these amendments have never been challenged, they are now a part of the Constitution by prescription. This means that the Constitution may be amended either in the manner provided in Article V or as a result of the fact that, for an indefinite period, a proposed amendment has been supposed to be a part of the Constitution and nobody has challenged its validity.

"It is, of course, true that the people of the United States in adopting the Constitution could ordain that amendments adopted as therein provided should become a part of the Constitution. But we deny that the people of the United States, or of any State, can be bound by any amendment which is not adopted in the manner provided in Article V, no matter how long a time may elapse before some one questions its validity. It may be that, after a long lapse of time, general acquiescence in an amendment may have some weight as indicating the contemporaneous construction of the Constitution. If, however, anything can be established in this connection by anything akin to prescription, it would be that, through the long practice of the Government and the construction of Article V by those dealing with amendments, the propriety of the proposal in the manner adopted with respect to the eighteenth amendment has become the established construction of Article V. But the conclusive answer is that the Congress having, by a two-thirds vote of each House, proposed an amendment, it is indisputable and the highest evidence that they deemed it necessary to make such proposal. Why they reached this conclusion is immaterial. Res ipsa loquitur.

"VI.—The Volstead Act, if otherwise constitutional, is effective in the State of New Jersey without the concurrence of the legislature of that State.

"If the eighteenth amendment is a part of the Constitution, it is next insisted that the Volstead Act, even though otherwise constitutional, is not effective in the State of New Jersey, because the legislature of that State has not concurred in it. This argument is based upon the second section of the amendment, which is that—

"'The Congress and the several States shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation.'

"It is said that, by reason of this section, no law for the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment is valid unless it represents, in some way, the concurrent action of Congress and the legislature of the State. In other words, to be valid, a law must be the act of both Congress and the legislature of the State. The mandate of the amendment is made to read as though it was that the article shall be enforced by legislation in which the Congress and the several States concur.

"There is an express purpose, of course, that Congress shall have power to legislate for the enforcement of the amendment. The only qualification or limitation of the power so conferred is that instead of being exclusive it shall be concurrent with a like power in the several States. It is not required that there shall be joint action by Congress and the States, or that the legislation enacted by the one shall be concurred in by the other. A new rule of fundamental law was introduced into the Constitution. It was deemed necessary to give Congress the power to enforce it. Congress might have been given the exclusive power. The use of the word 'concurrent' conclusively negatives any such purpose.

"The contention of appellant is that concurrent power necessarily means a power in the exercise of which Congress and the States do not act separately and independently, but must act jointly, or, at least, in cooperation and by mutual consent and agreement. If this be correct, then the eighteenth amendment is a much more startling innovation than has heretofore been imagined by its stanchest opponents. In a few instances certain actions by the States are subject to the consent of Congress, but whenever the Constitution intended such a thing it provided it in express terms and did not use the phrase 'concurrent power.' In the matter of the enactment of general laws no such thing has ever been known in the history of this country as laws in the enactment of which both Congress and the legislatures of the several States participate. Each acts for a separate and distinct government, and it is wholly inconsistent with the governmental functions of each to require them to act in concert in the adoption of laws. Each enacts its own laws to be enforced by the courts of its own government, subject, however, to the jurisdiction of the Federal courts to determine whether State legislation conflicts with the Federal Constitution.

"It is true that the word 'concurrent' has various meanings, according to the connection in which it is used. It may undoubtedly be used to indicate that something is to be accomplished by two or more persons acting together. It is equally true that it means in other connections a right which two or more persons, acting separately and apart from each other, may exercise at the same time. It would be idle, however, to go into all the meanings which may attach to this word. In certain connections it has a well fixed and established meaning, which is controlling in this case. When we speak of the concurrent jurisdiction of courts, there is no room for misunderstanding the term. We never understand it to mean a jurisdiction in the exercise of which both of the courts must have a part. Quite to the contrary, it means that the two courts have an equal right to exercise, each acting without the participation of the other, the same jurisdiction.

"It is to be noted that section 2 does not say that legislation shall be concurrent, but that the concurrent power to legislate shall exist. The concurrent power of the States and Congress to legislate is nothing new. And its meaning has been too long settled, historically and judicially, to now admit of question. The term has acquired a fixed meaning through its frequent use by this court and eminent statesmen and writers in referring to the concurrent power of Congress and the States to legislate. Practically all the powers of government before the Constitution were in the people of the several States. Such powers as were not delegated to the Federal Government remained in the people of the State. Where Congress was given the exclusive power to legislate on a certain subject, the power of the State over that subject was destroyed. If the power of Congress to legislate, however, was not made by the Constitution exclusive, the right of the State to legislate on that subject continued, and the Congress and the States were said to have concurrent power to legislate. There were numerous instances of this kind, and this is the meaning which the term 'concurrent power' in this connection has had from the beginning.

"In the thirty-second number of the Federalist, as quoted in the brief of counsel in Fox v. State of Ohio (5 How., 410, 418), it was said:

"'An entire consolidation of the States into one complete national sovereignty would imply an entire subordination of the parts, and whatever power might remain in them would be altogether dependent on the general will. But as the plan of the convention aims only at a partial union or consolidation, the State governments would clearly retain all the rights of sovereignty which they before had and which were not by that act exclusively delegated to Congress. This exclusive delegation, or rather this alienation of State sovereignty, would only exist in three cases: Where the Constitution in express terms granted an exclusive authority to the Union; where it granted, in one instance, an authority to the Union and in another prohibited the States from exercising the like authority; and where it granted an authority to the Union to which a similar authority in the States would be absolutely and totally contradictory and repugnant. I use these terms to distinguish this last case from another which might appear to resemble it, but which would, in fact, be essentially different; I mean, where the exercise of a concurrent jurisdiction might be productive of occasional interferences in the policy of any branch of administration, but would not imply any direct contradiction or repugnancy in point of constitutional authority.'

"Of course, as used here, the expression 'concurrent jurisdiction' can not refer to anything except separate, distinct, and independent action by the States and by Congress, respectively. It is power thus separately exercised by the two Governments that this court has from the beginning described as 'concurrent power.' The court has also kept in mind always the fact that many of the powers conferred upon Congress are similar to those already existing in the State government, and that, unless the intention to make the power of Congress exclusive was expressed or necessarily implied, the power of the State remained, subject only to the constitutional provision that in case of conflict the laws of Congress should be paramount. Thus, in Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., 1, 47), Mr. Justice Story said:

"'The Constitution containing a grant of powers, in many instances, similar to those already existing in the State governments, and some of these being of vital importance also to State authority and State legislation, it is not to be admitted that a mere grant of such powers, in affirmative terms, to Congress does, per se, transfer an exclusive sovereignty on such subjects to the latter. On the contrary, a reasonable interpretation of that instrument necessarily leads to the conclusion that the powers so granted are never exclusive of similar powers existing in the States unless where the Constitution has expressly, in terms, given an exclusive power to Congress or the exercise of a like power is prohibited to the States or there is a direct repugnancy or incompatibility in the exercise of it by the States. The example of the first class is to be found in the exclusive legislation delegated to Congress over places purchased by the consent of the legislature of the State in which the same shall be for forts, arsenals, dockyards, etc.; of the second class, the prohibition of a State to coin money or emit bills of credit; of the third class, as this court have already held, the power to establish a uniform rule of naturalization (Chirac v. Chirac, 2 Wheat., 258, 269), and the delegation of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction. (Martin v. Hunter, 1 Wheat., 304, 337; and see The Federalist, No. 32.) In all other cases not falling within the classes already mentioned it seems unquestionable that the States retain concurrent authority with Congress not only upon the letter and spirit of the eleventh amendment of the Constitution but upon the soundest principles of general reasoning. There is this reserve, however, that in cases of concurrent authority, where the laws of the States and of the Union are in direct and manifest collision on the same subject, those of the Union, being "the supreme law of the land," are of paramount authority, and the State laws, so far, and so far only, as such incompatibility exists, must necessarily yield.'

"And in the same case, at page 54, it was said:

"'In considering this question it is always to be kept in view that the case is not of a new power granted to Congress where no similar power already existed in the States.'

"Here, in speaking of concurrent power and concurrent authority, it is impossible to say that anything was referred to except authority or power which the States and Congress could each exercise, acting separately and independently. Indeed, it is expressly said that where the granting of power to Congress is in general terms, and the power is not of such a nature as to be necessarily exclusive, it is to be exercised by Congress, with the States retaining a right to exercise it at the same time, subject only to the qualification that, in the case of a direct conflict between State and Federal laws the latter must prevail. It is true what has been quoted above was said in the course of a dissenting opinion, but it is not in conflict with anything that was said in the opinion of the court and is an accurate statement of the rule which has always been recognized by this court.

In the case of Prigg v. Pennsylvania (16 Pet., 536) in considering a State statute, the court said, at page 621:

"'The remaining question is, whether the power of legislation upon this subject is exclusive in the National Government, or concurrent in the States, until it is exercised by Congress.'

"Here the court describes a power which may be exercised by Congress and which may also be exercised independently by the States as a concurrent power of the two.

"In Gibbons v. Ogden (9 Wheat., 1, 209) the expression 'concurrent power' was used in the sense which we attribute to it when the court said, speaking of the possibility that an act of Congress and an act of the legislature of the State might come into collision, that—

"'Should this collision exist, it will be immaterial whether those laws were passed in virtue of a concurrent power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations and among the several States," or in virtue of a power to regulate their domestic trade and police.'

"In Covington, etc., Bridge Co. v. Kentucky (154 U. S., 204) the court described the class of Federal and State statutes which may properly be said to have been enacted in the exercise of a concurrent power. It was said, at page 209:

"'The adjudications of this court with respect to the power of the States over the general subject of commerce are divisible into three classes: First, those in which the power of the State is exclusive; second, those in which the States may act in the absence of legislation by Congress; third, those in which the action of Congress is exclusive and the States can not interfere at all.'

"And at page 211, referring to the second class—that is, those in which the States may act in the absence of legislation by Congress—it was said:

"'Within the second class of cases—those of what may be termed concurrent jurisdiction—are embraced laws for the regulation of pilots.'

* * * * * * *

"In the Passenger Cases (7 How., 282, 396), in holding that the power of Congress over the subject of interstate commerce was necessarily exclusive, it was said:

"'A concurrent power in the States to regulate commerce is an anomaly not found in the Constitution. If such power exist, it may be exercised independently of the Federal authority.'

"This was said in connection with the proposition that the power to regulate is necessarily an exclusive power.

"It will thus be seen that in legal nomenclature the concurrent power of the States and of Congress is clearly and unmistakably defined. It simply means the right of each to act with respect to a particular subject matter separately and independently.

"Whether the intention of the Constitution, in conferring legislative power upon Congress, was to make that power exclusive may frequently be the subject of controversy. Undoubtedly the general power of taxation conferred upon Congress is not exclusive. The clearest example of concurrent power in Congress and the States is perhaps to be seen in the power of taxation. Congress may tax incomes. The States, acting separately and independently and for their own purposes, may tax the same incomes. In other words, they have the concurrent power by legislation to impose taxes. The power to coin money, if it depended alone upon the section of the Constitution which confers that power upon the Congress, would likewise not be exclusive. But another provision of the Constitution denies the right to coin money to the States, and thus the power of Congress becomes exclusive. The power to regulate interstate commerce is not declared by the Constitution to be exclusive, nor is it, in terms, prohibited to the States. But the power to regulate necessarily includes all that may be done for that purpose. It is incomplete unless it can be exerted to its full extent. This power of Congress, therefore, is of necessity and from its very nature exclusive. In other cases, however, where the concurrent power exists, in whatever way either Congress or the States choose to exert it, it is exerted by each independently of the other.

"From what has been said it is evident that if the eighteenth amendment had simply provided that Congress should have the power to regulate or prohibit the manufacture, sale, and transportation of intoxicating liquors throughout the United States, the power, like that to regulate interstate commerce, would have been exclusive. If the enforcement section had simply conferred power, as the thirteenth amendment did, upon Congress without mentioning the States, it is by no means certain that the States would not still have had the power which they have always had to prohibit the liquor traffic within their borders. Congress was given the power to enforce the thirteenth amendment, and it has enacted a statute prohibiting, throughout the United States, every form of slavery or involuntary servitude. Some of the States already had laws prohibiting slavery. It would hardly be said that these laws were nullified by the adoption of the amendment or that offenders against them could not be punished in the States. And if to-day a State should enact a law making it unlawful for one man to hold in involuntary servitude another, it is difficult to see upon what principle it could be said that such a law would be invalid and could not be enforced in the State courts. Certainly it would not conflict with the thirteenth amendment, and would be a valid law unless it could be said that the exclusive power to legislate on that subject had been given to Congress.

"There is nothing new in the proposition that a single act may be a violation of both State and Federal laws and punishable in the courts of the same Government. Indeed, one of the general provisions of the Revised Statutes under the Title of Crimes is section 5328, as follows:

"'Nothing in this title shall be held to take away or impair the jurisdiction of the courts of the several States under the laws thereof.'

"It is an offense against the laws of the United States to pass counterfeit money. (United States v. Marigold, 9 How. 559.) It has, nevertheless, been held that a State may make the passing of counterfeit money an offense against its laws and punishable in its courts. (Fox v. State of Ohio, 5 How. 410, 432.) It is true, in the case of the passing of counterfeit money, it may be said that the act of Congress is justified by the power of the Government to protect the money coined by it, and that the object of the State legislation is to protect its citizens against fraud. But the fact remains that a single act by the individual is an offense against both laws. This latter fact prevents a conviction or acquittal in the courts of one government from being a bar to a prosecution in the courts of the other. It is possible that the second section of the eighteenth amendment, as it expressly contemplates action by both governments, may be given such a meaning that a prosecution in the courts of one government may be held to bar a prosecution for the same offense in the courts of the other. This, however, is a question which can only be decided when it arises. The present contention is simply that the act of Congress is not valid until concurred in by the State. It is submitted that there is in the authorities no warrant for such a contention.

"It appears that since the eighteenth amendment went into effect the State of New Jersey has passed a prohibition law. It has not seen fit to make this law quite so rigid as the Volstead Act. The New Jersey act prohibits manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors. Congress in adopting the Volstead Act thought that, in order to effectively prohibit intoxicating liquors, it was necessary to prohibit all beverages containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. The Legislature of New Jersey thought the object in view could be accomplished without going so far, and hence confined its prohibition to beverages containing more than 3½ per cent of alcohol. Each is a valid law. The one is to be enforced through the courts of the United States, the other through the courts of the State of New Jersey. A man who sells whisky, for instance, violates both laws. He may be convicted in the courts of either. When he is so convicted in one the question may arise as to whether he can again be prosecuted in the other. On the other hand, if a man sells beer containing 2.75 per cent of alcohol he does not violate the New Jersey law, and therefore can not be prosecuted in the courts of that State. But whether such beer is actually intoxicating or not the Congress has deemed it necessary to include it in the prohibition in order to effectually prohibit intoxicating liquors. The seller of such beer in New Jersey, therefore, is subject to prosecution and punishment in the Federal courts, although not in the State courts.

"There is no actual conflict between the two laws. They both prohibit certain things. The act of Congress prohibits some other things which the State simply has not prohibited. Between these laws, then, it would hardly seem that any question can arise as to whether the one or the other controls—they are both valid laws. If, however, the State of New Jersey should pass a law expressly providing that 2¾ per cent beer should be lawful in that State there would be a conflict between that law and the Volstead Act. In the event of such a conflict it would doubtless be held that the law of New Jersey would be void because in conflict with a valid law of Congress.

"There is a striking analogy between this situation and that brought about by the passage of the Reed amendment. After the enactment of the Webb-Kenyon law many States prohibited the shipment of liquor to points within their borders and thus created an offense punishable in their own courts. Later, the Reed amendment prohibited the transportation in interstate commerce of liquor for beverage purposes into a dry State. One who shipped liquor into such a State committed an offense against both the State and Federal law and was subject to prosecution in both the State and Federal courts. But the State and Federal prohibitions were not always coextensive. In West Virginia the law permitted one to personally bring in a limited quantity for his own use. But, though not subject to prosecution in the State courts, he could be prosecuted in the Federal court for a violation of the Reed amendment. (United States v. Dan Hill, 248 U. S., 420.)

"The debates in Congress at the time the amendment was proposed throw but little light on what was understood by concurrent power. In a recent speech in Congress Chairman Volstead has, however, given such a clear exposition of concurrent power that we venture to print, as an appendix to this brief, his remarks as published in the Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 23, 1920.

"It is respectfully submitted that the validity of the Volstead Act does not depend in any sense upon whether it has been concurred in by the State of New Jersey or not.

"VII.—In order to enforce, with any degree of efficiency, the eighteenth amendment a definition of intoxicating liquor was essential—The definition provided by the Volstead Act includes nothing which Congress could not properly deem necessary to enforce the provisions of the amendment, and is therefore not arbitrary.

"The specific prohibition of the eighteenth amendment is directed against the manufacture, transportation, importation, or exportation of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes. Both by section 2 of the amendment and by the concluding paragraph of Article I, section 8, of the Constitution, Congress is given the power to enact legislation that may be appropriate to enforce the prohibition.

"Section 3 of Title II of the Volstead Act follows the eighteenth amendment and makes it unlawful to manufacture, transport, import, sell, or export intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes.

"Section 1 of Title II of the Volstead Act, as hereinbefore quoted, defines, for the purposes of the act, 'intoxicating liquor.'

"Section 37 provides for regulations under which the beverages mentioned in the proviso to that section may be manufactured and sold, the regulations being designed to prevent the evasions of the prohibitory law through such manufacture and sale.

"The definition above quoted is assailed as being beyond the power of Congress to enact. It is said that the amendment authorizes Congress to prohibit only intoxicating liquor, and that a beverage which does not contain largely more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol is not intoxicating. The contention is that Congress, being empowered only to prohibit intoxicating liquors, can not, by definition, make a beverage intoxicating which is not, in fact, intoxicating within the meaning of the language of the amendment. For this reason it is said that the definition adopted is untruthful and arbitrary, and therefore unconstitutional.

"It is true, of course, that Congress can not extend its powers by giving to the language used in conferring those powers an arbitrary meaning which does not belong to it. But so long as it has the constitutional power to do the thing which it does, it may use the words employed by it for that purpose in any sense which it chooses to give them. In other words, if in order to enforce the eighteenth amendment it has the power to prohibit the sale or manufacture of beverages containing less alcohol than is necessary to render them per se intoxicating, it is immaterial whether it provides separately for their prohibition or accomplishes the same thing by including them, for the purposes of the act, in the definition of intoxicating liquor. If, therefore, for any reason it is competent for Congress to prohibit such beverages as a means for securing the enforcement of the prohibition against intoxicating liquors, the definition adopted in the Volstead Act can not be successfully assailed.

"It is not denied that legislation, even if apparently an exertion of the police power, may be declared invalid because arbitrary and discriminatory; that such exertion of power may be so arbitrary and discriminatory as to amount to a taking of property; that legislation enacted for the ostensible purpose of putting into execution an express power may be invalid upon the ground that the thing enacted has no reasonable relation to the exertion of such a power; and that the nature of a legislative act is determined by what it, in effect, is and not necessarily by what the legislative body chooses to call it. There is, therefore, no quarrel with the authorities cited by those who assail this act, such as Interstate Commerce Commission v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 227 U. S., 88, 91; Dobbins v. Los Angeles, 195 U. S., 223, 241; Adair v. United States, 208 U. S., 161; McLean v. Arkansas, 211 U. S., 539; Adams v. Tanner, 244 U. S., 590; St. Louis, I. M. & S. v. Wynne, 224 U. S., 354; Cotting v. Kansas City, etc., 183 U. S., 79; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S., 356; Galveston, etc., v. Texas, 210 U. S., 217; Choctaw, etc., v. Harrison, 235 U. S., 292, 298; Western Union v. Kansas, 216 U. S., 1, 37; Monongahela v. United States, 148 U. S., 312, 327; United States v. Dewitt, 9 Wallace, 41, 44; Hodges v. United States, 203 U. S., 1; United States v. Reese, 92 U. S., 214; James v. Bowman, 190 U. S., 127; Civil Rights Cases, 109 U. S., 1. But wherever it can be said that a particular enactment has a reasonable relation to the accomplishment of that which Congress is empowered to do, and Congress has determined that such an enactment is necessary for that purpose, the courts do not inquire into the correctness of the judgment of Congress or the wisdom of the policy adopted by it. In the present case, then, the question is, Does the prohibition of an alcoholic liquor, even though not itself intoxicating, have any reasonable relation to the effective prohibition of intoxicating liquors? If so, there has been conferred upon Congress the express power to enact such a prohibition, and there is no constitutional ground upon which the definition in question can be successfully challenged.

"It is sought to bring the definition above quoted within the authority of the cases just cited, and by applying the rules there applied, to reach the conclusion that this definition is arbitrary, and has no reasonable relation to the enforcement of the eighteenth amendment. It is idle now, however, to speculate as to whether these rules might be construed as justifying the conclusion thus urged. This court has already too clearly defined the extent to which a legislative body may properly go for the purpose of enforcing such a prohibition in the case of both State and Federal legislation.

"Of course, it is conceded that Congress can not, for the purpose of exerting any power which is conferred upon it, legislate so as to abridge any of the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States. But the right even to own or hold intoxicating liquors for personal use is not one of those fundamental privileges of a citizen which can not be abridged. As said by Mr. Justice McReynolds in Crane v. Campbell (245 U. S., 304, 308):

"'We further think it clearly follows from our numerous decisions upholding prohibition legislation that the right to hold intoxicating liquors for personal use is not one of those fundamental privileges of a citizen of the United States which no State may abridge. A contrary view would be incompatible with the undoubted power to prevent manufacture, gift, sale, purchase, or transportation of such articles, the only feasible ways of getting them. An assured right of possession would necessarily imply some adequate method to obtain not subject to destruction at the will of the State.'

"It had previously been said in the same case:

"'It must now be regarded as settled that, on account of their well-known noxious qualities and the extraordinary evils shown by experience commonly to be consequent upon their use, a State has power absolutely to prohibit manufacture, gift, purchase, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within its borders without violating the guaranties of the fourteenth amendment.' (Id., 307.)

"The right of a State to prohibit the possession of intoxicating liquors was treated, however, as arising from and being implied in the right to prohibit the manufacture, purchase, sale, and transportation. Thus it was said:

"'As the State has the power above indicated to prohibit, it may adopt such measures as are reasonably appropriate or needful to render exercise of that power effective. (Booth v. Illinois, 184 U. S., 425; Silz v. Hesterberg, 211 U. S., 31; Murphy v. California, 225 U. S., 623; and Rast v. Van Deman & Lewis Co., 240 U. S., 342, 364.) And, considering the notorious difficulties always attendant upon efforts to suppress traffic in liquors, we are unable to say that the challenged inhibition of their possession was arbitrary and unreasonable or without proper relation to the legitimate legislative purpose.' (Id., 307–308.)

"In other words, entirely aside from the question as to whether a State has the independent power to prohibit the possession of intoxicating liquors, it has the power to enact such a prohibition if deemed necessary to make effective its prohibition against the sale and manufacture of intoxicating liquors. It will be said, however, that that case, in all its aspects, involved only intoxicating liquors which were expressly included in the conceded power to prohibit the sale and manufacture. It is then argued that, in order to make effective the prohibition of a noxious article, it is incompetent to also prohibit one which is not noxious in itself. This contention, however, was expressly and emphatically rejected in Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch (226 U. S., 192). In that case a conviction was sustained for a violation of the prohibitory law of the State of Mississippi, although it was stipulated that the malt beverage in question, which was included within the broad terms of the prohibition, contained no alcohol and was in no sense intoxicating. Speaking of the decision in that case this court, through Mr. Justice Brandeis, said in Ruppert v. Caffey, decided January 5, 1920:

"'Purity Extract Co. v. Lynch (226 U. S., 192) determined that State legislation of this character is valid and set forth with clearness the constitutional ground upon which it rests: "When a State exerting its recognized authority undertakes to suppress what it is free to regard as a public evil, it may adopt such measures having reasonable relation to that end as it may deem necessary in order to make its action effective. It does not follow that because a transaction separately considered is innocuous it may not be included in a prohibition the scope of which is regarded as essential in the legislative judgment to accomplish a purpose within the admitted power of the Government." (P. 201.) * * * "It was competent for the Legislature of Mississippi to recognize the difficulties besetting the administration of laws aimed at the prevention of traffic in intoxicants. It prohibited, among other things, the sale of 'malt liquors.' In thus dealing with a class of beverages which in general are regarded as intoxicating, it was not bound to resort to a discrimination with respect to ingredients and processes of manufacture which, in the endeavor to eliminate innocuous beverages from the condemnation, would facilitate subterfuges and frauds, and fetter the enforcement of the law. A contrary conclusion logically pressed would save the nominal power while preventing its effective exercise." (P. 204.) * * * "The State, within the limits we have stated, must decide upon the measures that are needful for the protection of its people, and having regard to the artifices which are used to promote the sale of intoxicants under the guise of innocent beverages, it would constitute an unwarranted departure from accepted principle to hold that the prohibition of the sale of all malt liquors, including the beverage in question, was beyond its reserved power."' (P. 205.)

"Here again the right of the legislature to prohibit a beverage not itself intoxicating and entirely harmless was not based on any independent right to do so. It was based alone upon the ground that it was necessary to prevent evasions of the law prohibiting intoxicating and harmful beverages. Undoubtedly, then, it is too well established to admit of controversy that a State has ample power to pass a prohibition measure in the exact terms of the Volstead Act. If Congress, therefore, has as broad a power as the States have always had to enforce the prohibition of intoxicating liquors, the provision or definition assailed in this case was a valid exertion of its constitutional power. That Congress, in the exercise of its war powers, has exactly the same power in this regard as the States have in the exercise of their police powers is settled. The war prohibition act of November 21, 1918 (40 Stat., ch. 212, pp. 1045, 1046), prohibited the manufacture or sale of certain beverages. Construing that act, however, this court held that, by its own terms, the prohibition was limited to intoxicating liquor. (Standard Brewery Co. v. United States, decided January 5, 1920.) In Title I of the Volstead Act, passed October 28, 1919, and intended to provide for the better enforcement of the act of November 21, 1918, however, it was provided in section 1 that thereafter the language used in the act of November 21, 1918, should be construed so as to include beverages of the class named which might not, in fact, be intoxicating. This was accomplished by the following provision:

"'The words "beer, wine, or other intoxicating malt or vinous liquors" in the war prohibition act shall be hereafter construed to mean any such beverages which contain one-half of 1 per cent or more of alcohol by volume: Provided, That the foregoing definition shall not extend to dealcoholized wine nor to any beverage or liquid produced by the process by which beer, ale, porter, or wine is produced, if it contains less than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol by volume, and is made as prescribed in section 37 of Title II of this act, and is otherwise denominated than as beer, ale, or porter, and is contained and sold in or from such sealed and labeled bottles, casks, or containers as the commissioner may by regulation prescribe.'

"By this it will be seen the beverages prohibited by the war prohibition act were defined exactly as intoxicating liquors were defined in Title II of the Volstead Act, intended to enforce the eighteenth amendment. Precisely the same objection was made to the war prohibition act that is now made to the present act. The question was whether Congress, in the exercise of its war powers, could enact so broad a prohibition. This court in Ruppert v. Caffey, above, regarded the case as turning upon the question of whether, in the exercise of the war powers, Congress had as ample power over intoxicating liquors as the States had in the exercise of their police powers, and said:

"'If the war power of Congress to effectively prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors in order to promote the Nation's efficiency in men, munitions, and supplies, is as full and complete as the police power of the States to effectively enforce such prohibition in order to promote the health, safety, and morals of the community, it is clear that this provision of the Volstead Act is valid and has rendered immaterial the question whether plaintiff's beer is intoxicating. For the legislation and decisions of the highest courts of nearly all of the States establish that it is deemed impossible to effectively enforce either prohibitory laws or other laws merely regulating the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors if liability or inclusion within the law is made to depend upon the issuable fact whether or not a particular liquor made or sold as a beverage is intoxicating. In other words, it clearly appears that a liquor law, to be capable of effective enforcement must, in the opinion of the legislatures and courts of the several States, be made to apply either to all liquors of the species enumerated, like beer, ale, or wine, regardless of the presence or degree of alcoholic content; or if a more general description is used, such as distilled, rectified, spirituous, fermented, malt, or brewed liquors, to all liquors within that general description regardless of alcoholic content; or to such of these liquors as contain a named percentage of alcohol; and often several such standards are combined so that certain specific and generic liquors are altogether forbidden and such other liquors as contain a given percentage of alcohol.'

"'That the Federal Government would, in attempting to enforce a prohibitory law, be confronted with difficulties similar to those encountered by the States is obvious; and both this experience of the States and the need of the Federal Government of legislation defining intoxicating liquors as was done in the Volstead Act was clearly set forth in the reports of the House Committee on the Judiciary in reporting the bill to the Sixty-fifth Congress, third session, Report 1143, February 26, 1919, and to the Sixty-sixth Congress, first session, Report 91, June 30, 1919. Furthermore, recent experience of the military forces had shown the necessity of fixing a definite alcoholic test for the purpose of administering the limited prohibitory law included in the selective-service act of May 18, 1917, chapter 15, section 12, 40 Statutes, 76, 82. And the Attorney General, calling attention specifically to the claim made in respect to the 2.75 per cent beer, had pointed out to Congress that definition of intoxicating liquor by fixed standards was essential to effective enforcement of the prohibition law. It is therefore clear both that Congress might reasonably have considered some legislative definition of intoxicating liquor to be essential to effective enforcement of prohibition and also that the definition provided by the Volstead Act was not an arbitrary one.

"'Plaintiff's argument is equivalent to saying that the war power of Congress to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors does not extend to the adoption of such means to this end as, in its judgment, are necessary to the effective administration of the law. * * * The police power of a State over the liquor traffic is not limited to the power to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors supported by a separate implied power to prohibit kindred nonintoxicating liquors so far as necessary to make the prohibition of intoxicants effective; it is a single broad power to make such laws, by way of prohibition, as may be required to effectively suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors. Likewise the implied war power over intoxicating liquors extends to the enactment of laws which will not merely prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors but will effectually prevent their sale.'

"It is thus beyond doubt that a State in the exercise of its police power may make such laws, by way of prohibition, as in the judgment of its legislature may be required to effectively suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors. It is likewise decided that, in the exercise of its war powers, Congress has the same broad power to enact such measures as may be necessary to suppress the same traffic. In both cases it has been expressly held that, if deemed necessary by the legislative body, the means adopted may be the inclusion, in the definition of intoxicating liquors, of beverages containing no alcohol, or containing one-half of 1 per cent alcohol.

"When the national prohibition act was passed Congress had no independent police power over the liquor traffic. It was held, however, that, when necessary to the full and efficient exertion of its war powers, it had precisely the same power over this traffic that the States had. Now, by virtue of the eighteenth amendment, there has been conferred upon it the express power to enact such legislation as may be necessary to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors throughout the United States, and, to the extent necessary to do this, it is endowed with the police powers which have heretofore been exercised by the States alone. Certainly, if in the exertion of its war powers it had the right, when deemed necessary, to suppress the liquor traffic, and, in order to effectively accomplish that end, had the power to include, in its prohibition, liquors which, though not intoxicating, could be used as a means of evading the law, it can not be doubted that, since it has acquired the express power to prohibit, as a police measure, the liquor traffic, the power to enact legislation deemed necessary to accomplish that result can not be more limited than when it was merely exercising its war powers. In the latter case it was held to have the same power which the State had when legislating to promote the health, safety, and morals of the community.

"The regulation or suppression of the liquor traffic has long been recognized as a legitimate exercise of power to promote the safety, health, and morals of the community. When, therefore, Congress was empowered to suppress the liquor traffic throughout the United States it was in that regard clothed with the same power, acting for the whole country, which the several States had previously exerted acting for themselves. Such measures, therefore, as have been held to be appropriate enforcement measures when adopted by the States must now of necessity be held equally appropriate when enacted by Congress to enforce the eighteenth amendment.

"This rule, as shown above, has been applied when Congress had the power to suppress the liquor traffic only when it deemed such suppression necessary for the proper exertion of its war power. This forecloses any question as to the applicability of the rule when Congress is exerting police powers expressly and directly conferred for the purpose of suppressing the liquor traffic.

"Some question is made, based upon the fact that, under the Volstead Act (41 Stat., ch. 83, pp. 305 et seq.), a beverage made by the process by which beer is made, but containing less than one-half of 1 per cent alcohol, can not be sold at all if called beer, but may, under certain conditions, be sold under other names. As seen above, this identical provision was in the definition which Congress applied to the war prohibition act, and which this court held valid. This would seem to be a conclusive answer. It is, however, difficult to comprehend the force of the argument based on the fact above stated. Certainly it is not a matter of which the brewer can complain. The authorities cited show conclusively that Congress might, if it had seen fit, have prohibited all malt liquors containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent, or, indeed, whether they contained any alcohol or not. If all were, therefore, subject to valid prohibition, no just complaint can be made because Congress did not go as far as it might have gone.

"Obviously Congress recognized that there were a number of beverages, including whisky, brandy, beer, and wine, which, from time immemorial, have been known and understood by the public to be intoxicating liquor. It could be very well said, therefore, that any practical and efficient enforcement of the law would be very greatly impeded if any articles whatever were permitted to be sold under any of these well-known names, and that it was therefore necessary and important to avoid the necessity of showing, in any case, the quantity of alcohol contained in any beverage offered to the public as beer, wine, whisky, or brandy. On the other hand, it seems to have been recognized that there might be conditions under which beverages made by the same process and containing so little alcohol as to be entirely innocuous might be sold without serious interference with the enforcement of the law. Such sales, therefore, were not prohibited provided they were not made under one of the names which the public had so long been accustomed to associate exclusively with intoxicating drinks. If, therefore, the alleged discrimination was one of which those previously engaged in manufacturing beer could complain, instead of being a provision in their favor, as it is, there is ample ground for saying that there was nothing arbitrary in drawing a distinction between an article sold as beer and a somewhat similar article sold under another name.

"Clearly the contention now made against the definition in question has been unmistakably foreclosed by the recent decisions of this court.

"VIII.—The fact that by the passage of the Volstead Act on October 28, 1919, and the going into effect of the second title of that act and the eighteenth amendment on January 16, 1920, the sale of nonintoxicating beer containing as much as one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol was prohibited by the war prohibition act does not render Title II of the Volstead Act invalid, even as to the sale of such beer lawfully manufactured before October 28, 1919.

"Under the heading 'The destruction of lawfully preexisting property is unconstitutional,' an argument is made in support of the contention that Title II of the Volstead Act is invalid in so far as it prohibits the sale of nonintoxicating beer lawfully manufactured before the passage of that act on October 28, 1919. This is upon the theory that the result of that act is to destroy the value of such beer without making compensation.

"It can not now seriously be contended that to the extent that a financial loss results to individuals from the passage of a law in the rightful exercise of the police power there is a taking of property which requires compensation to be made to the owner. The manufacture and sale of liquor where it was once lawful can not be prohibited without a resulting loss to those engaged in the business, but this exercise of the police power is not a taking of property. (Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S., 623.) This is the clearly established rule both with respect to State and Federal legislation. In Hamliton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., decided by this court December 15, 1919 (251 U. S., 146, 156–157), it was said:

"'If the nature and conditions of a restriction upon the use or disposition of property is such that a State could, under the police power, impose it consistently with the fourteenth amendment without making compensation, then the United States may for a permitted purpose impose a like restriction consistently with the fifth amendment without making compensation; * * *.'

"It is not understood that any claim is now asserted that a government enacting prohibition is bound to make compensation to those who thereby become losers. Indeed, the general rule to the contrary seems to be conceded, and the insistence is limited to a claim that with respect to lawfully preexisting property, even assuming that its sale or disposition may be prohibited when deemed necessary to accomplish some object within the legislative power, either compensation must be made for such property or a reasonable time allowed for its disposition after the passage of the act.

"Title II of the Volstead Act was enacted on October 28, 1919, and did not become effective until January 16, 1920. During the intervening time, however, the war prohibition act was in effect and, as amended by Title I of the Volstead Act, it prohibited the sale for beverage purposes in this country of the so-called nonintoxicating beer, the manufacture of which prior to October 28, 1919, had been lawful. It is therefore true that brewers who had on hand on October 28, 1919, a stock of these lawfully manufactured beverages had no opportunity, before the eighteenth amendment went into effect, to dispose of such beverages except for export purposes.

"In the case of Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., supra, there was a contention that the war prohibition act was invalid because its result was to destroy without compensation the value of spirituous liquors previously manufactured. That act, however, did not take effect for seven months after its passage, and the court said:

"'We can not say that seven months and nine days was not a reasonable time within which to dispose of all liquors in bonded warehouses on November 21, 1918.' (Id., p. 158.)

"If the question of whether a reasonable time was allowed was important, Title II of the Volstead Act, which is now involved, allowed from October 28, 1919, to January 16, 1920, in which these nonintoxicating beverages could be disposed of. If this was all, that length of time would certainly be as reasonable in the case of beverages which are commonly manufactured for quick sale as seven months would be in the case of bonded liquors which require a long period of ripening before they are ready for sale. It is doubtless true that in passing the Volstead Act Congress assumed that the war would be terminated and the war prohibition act no longer effective before January 16, 1920, and that, therefore, there would be a period in which these nonintoxicating beverages could be disposed of. As it turned out, however, this was not the case, and there was no interval in which sales could lawfully be made. These circumstances give rise to the present question.

"As against the sale of nonintoxicating beverages manufactured prior to October 28, 1919, then the question is whether the Volstead Act is invalid because no opportunity was given to dispose of such beverages.

"If what has been quoted above from Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. had been all that the court said, it might be regarded as implying that if the time allowed had not been reasonable there would have been ground for the contention made; but the court added this, after saying that the time allowed could not be regarded as unreasonable:

"'And if, as is suggested, the liquors remaining in bond November 21, 1918, were not yet sufficiently ripened or aged to permit them to be advantageously disposed of within the limited period of seven months and nine days thereafter, the resulting inconvenience to the owner, attributable to the inherent qualities of the property itself, can not be regarded as a taking of property in the constitutional sense.' (Id., p. 158.)

"This contains a clear intimation, if not an express holding, that a prohibition law is valid without regard to whether it takes effect immediately or whether its result is to destroy the value of property lawfully acquired previously.

"The questions suggested, however, were squarely before the court in Ruppert v. Caffey, supra. In that case a corporation which had on hand a stock of lawfully manufactured nonintoxicating beverages on October 28, 1919, complained of Title I of the Volstead Act because it went into effect at once, and gave no opportunities to dispose of such beverages. The court said this:

"'Does the fact that Title I of the Volstead Act took effect upon its passage render section 1 invalid as against the plaintiff? Prohibition of the manufacture of malt liquors with alcoholic content of one-half of 1 per cent or more is permissible only because, in the opinion of Congress, the war emergency demands it. If, in its opinion, the particular emergency demands the immediate discontinuance of the traffic, Congress must have the power to require such discontinuance. To limit the power of Congress so that it may require discontinuance only after the lapse of a reasonable time from the passage of the act would seriously restrict it in the exercise of the war powers. Hardship resulting from making an act take effect upon its passage is a frequent incident of permissible legislation; but whether it shall be imposed rests wholly in the discretion of the lawmaking body. That the prohibition of the manufacture of nonintoxicating beer, if permissible at all, may be made to take effect immediately follows necessarily from the principle acted upon in Mugler v. Kansas (123 U. S. 623, 669), since the incidents attending the exercise by Congress of the war power to prohibit the liquor traffic are the same as those that attend the State's prohibition under the police power. In the Mugler case, also, the breweries were erected at a time when the State did not forbid the manufacture of malt liquors; and there it was alleged that the prohibition, which became effective almost immediately, would reduce the value of one of the breweries by three-fourths and would render the other of little value. Here, as there, the loss resulting to the plaintiff from inability to use the property for brewery purposes is an incident of the peculiar nature of the property and of the war need which, we must assume, demanded that the discontinuance of use be immediate. Plaintiff can not complain, because a discontinuance later would have caused him a similar loss. This, indeed, appears to be conceded so far as concerns the brewery and appurtenances. The objection on the ground that the prohibition takes effect immediately is confined to the prohibition of the sale of the beer on hand at the time of the passage of the act. But as to that also we can not say that the action of Congress was unreasonable or arbitrary.'

"Thus it was held that that act was not invalid because it took effect immediately, and, it may be added, it is that act at last which deprived the brewers of an opportunity to sell their stock of beverages before the eighteenth amendment went into effect. Moreover, the court expressly held that whether legislation which is otherwise permissible shall take effect so promptly as to result in hardship is wholly in the discretion of the lawmaking power. This is because the losses resulting from such legislation do not constitute a taking of private property. As said in Ruppert v. Caffey, supra:

"'Here, as in Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co., supra, there was no appropriation of private property, but merely a lessening of value due to a permissible restriction imposed upon its use.'

"Since, therefore, the validity of an act of this kind is not adversely affected by the fact that it goes into immediate effect, the only question is the power of a Government authorized to enact prohibition legislation to apply the prohibition to liquors acquired before the enactment of the law. In Hamilton v. Kentucky Distilleries & Warehouse Co. this was strongly urged upon the court as one contention that had not been foreclosed by previous decisions, and the court proceeded to foreclose it, saying:

"'The question whether an absolute prohibition of sale could be applied by a State to liquor acquired before the enactment of the prohibitory law has been raised by this court but not answered, because unnecessary to a decision. (Bartemeyer v. Iowa, 18 Wall. 129, 133; Beer Co. v. Massachusetts, 97 U. S. 25, 32-33; Eberle v. Michigan, 232 U. S. 700, 706; Barbour v. Georgia, 249 U. S. 454, 459. See, however, Mugler v. Kansas, supra, pp. 623, 625, 657.) But no reason appears why a State statute which postpones its effective date long enough to enable those engaged in the business to dispose of stocks on hand at the date of its enactment should be obnoxious to the fourteenth amendment, or why such a Federal law should be obnoxious to the fifth amendment. (Id., pp. 157-158.)'

"The court was there dealing with a statute which it held would give a reasonable time, and dealing with such a statute held that the fact that it prohibited the sale of liquor lawfully acquired was of no importance. In Ruppert v. Caffey, supra, as above shown, however, the court held with equal distinctness that the question of allowing a reasonable time was equally unimportant. The two decisions necessarily established the proposition that the validity of a permissible prohibition statute is not affected by the fact that it takes immediate effect and prohibits the sale of liquors previously acquired.

"In conclusion, it is respectfully submitted that the decree of the court below is in all respects correct and should be affirmed.

"APPENDIX A.

[Congress of the United States, begun and held at the city of New York, on Wednesday, the 4th of March, 1798.]

"The conventions of a number of the States, having at the time of their adopting the Constitution, expressed a desire, in order to prevent misconstruction or abuse of its powers, that further declaratory and restrictive clauses should be added, and as extending the ground of public confidence in the Government, will best insure the benificent ends of its institution:

"Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of both Houses concurring), That the following articles be proposed to the legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, all or any of which articles, when ratified by three-fourths of the said legislatures, to be valid to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution, viz:

"Articles in addition to and amendment of the Constitution of the United States of America proposed by Congress and ratified by the legislatures of the several States, pursuant to the fifth article of the original Constitution.

"Article the first. * * * After the first enumeration required by the first article of the Constitution there shall be one Representative for every 30,000, until the number shall amount to 100, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall be not less than 100 Representatives nor less than 1 Representative for every 40,000 persons until the number of Representatives shall amount to 200, after which the proportion shall be so regulated by Congress that there shall not be less than 200 Representatives nor more than 1 Representative for every 50,000 persons.

"Article the second. * * * No law varying the compensation for the services of the Senators and Representatives shall take effect until an election of Representatives shall have intervened.

"Article the third. * * * Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press, or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances.

"Article the fourth. * * * A well-regulated militia being necessary to the security of a free State, the right of the people to keep and bear arms shall not be infringed.

"Article the fifth. * * * No soldier shall in time of peace be quartered in any house without the consent of the owner, nor in time of war, but in a manner to be prescribed by law.

"Article the sixth. * * * The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized.

"Article the seventh. * * * No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces or in the militia when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself; nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

"Article the eighth. * * * In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor; and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

"Article the ninth. * * * In suits at common law, where the value in controversy shall exceed $20, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved, and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise reexamined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law.

"Article the tenth. * * * Excessive bail shall not be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

"Article the eleventh. * * * The enumeration in the Constitution of certain rights shall not be construed to deny or disparage others retained by the people.

"Article the twelfth. * * * The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively or to the people.

"APPENDIX B.

"[Remarks of Chairman VOLSTEAD in the House of Representatives (Appendix to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of Mar. 23, 1920).]

"CONCURRENT POWER.

"As the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains very little, if any, of the story or purpose of the provision contained in the prohibition amendment giving Congress and the several States concurrent power to enforce it, I may be permitted to submit a few observations, as it is a subject on which I have been frequently asked for information. The resolution proposing this amendment originated in the Senate; when it reached the House it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, of which I was then a member. It was there discussed among the members, especially among those who favored its adoption. It was, among other things, pointed out that if the amendment should be adopted in the form in which it had passed the Senate its effect might be to repeal or enable Congress to suspend every prohibition statute in the country, and that it ought to be made the duty of the State as well as the National Government to enforce it, as the States have courts and police forces equipped to do that work. Attention was also called to the fact that States and the Federal Government exercised the power to punish the same act, each in its own courts and under its own laws. As this power has usually been spoken of by courts and law writers as concurrent jurisdiction, and as it was sought to confer the like power on Congress and the several States, the phrase 'concurrent power' was adopted as expressing that idea. I do not know who wrote the provision, but I know that was the idea sought to be written into the amendment. Because of this provision many difficulties are predicted, conflicts of all kinds are anticipated. If construed as intended by those who proposed it, there is no occasion for concern. There is very little chance for any conflict.

"The amendment can not be enforced by granting the right to do certain things; it must be enforced by forbidding the things forbidden by the amendment. Any act left unpunished by a State may, nevertheless, be punished by the National Government, if such punishment tends to enforce the amendment, and likewise, to accomplish the same purpose, an act left unpunished by the National Government may be punished by the States. If a State should illegally authorize a person to sell beer containing, say, 2¾ per cent of alcohol, it would not occasion any conflict with the national law prohibiting the sale of beer containing more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcohol. The person so authorized would simply be in the position of one who has to get authority from two masters. It is possible that a conflict might arise if you can imagine that a State could make it the duty of a citizen to sell liquor in violation of the national law, but in that event the law of Congress would be supreme, unless that law was itself in violation of this amendment. There is no reason why the provision of the Constitution making the law of Congress supreme does not apply to legislation under this amendment. The fact that the power of Congress and the States is concurrent does not mean that the power of Congress is not supreme in cases of conflict. The very purpose of the provision making the laws of Congress supreme is to deal with cases of concurrent power, power existing at the same time over the same subject. If the eighteenth amendment had been a part of the Constitution when that instrument was adopted, I venture the opinion that no one would ever have suggested that the rule making the law of Congress supreme would not apply to laws passed under it. The exercise of concurrent power by Congress and the several States is neither new nor unusual; it has been constantly exercised ever since the Government was founded. It is expressly authorized by section 5328 of the Revised Statutes of the United States. This section in some form has been in force since 1825, and has been repeatedly recognized by our courts as valid.

"As to many offenses subject to Federal punishment, the States would have no power to punish if this statute was repealed. This makes the power dependent upon the will of Congress. To avoid such dependence, the provision giving the States power to enforce the amendment was written into it. The object of making the power concurrent was to obviate the rule that where Congress acts under a granted power it has the effect of suspending or annulling State laws on the same subject. It was the intention that the power to enforce should concur in the sense that at the same time and to accomplish the same purpose Congress and the several States might make and enforce laws. The strange contention is sometimes urged that those that proposed and ratified the amendment intended that the law of Congress should not be valid unless the State affected by it concurred in it by agreeing to it. If that is true, it follows as a necessary corollary that the law of a State is not valid unless Congress so concurs in it, and that as there are no such laws liquor is no longer subject to any control. Such a construction would defeat the very purpose of this provision and make the adoption of the amendment not a prohibition but a free-whisky law. The States would not only be helpless as against a hostile Congress, but Congress would likewise be without power. Why not contend that Congress in creating the municipal court for this District intended by the grant of concurrent jurisdiction to the municipal and supreme court of all actions in which the amount in controversy does not exceed $500 that the municipal court must concur in all judgments rendered by the supreme court in suits involving less than that sum to make such judgments valid?

"Not only was the amendment with this provision for concurrent power written by the friends of prohibition, but they proposed it by a vote of more than two-thirds of both branches of Congress, and it was also the friends of prohibition who ratified it in the legislatures of the various States. No one can seriously argue that these men meant to perpetrate such a stupendous fraud upon the people of the country as they have done if that is not what they meant. I am sure the people nowhere so understood it. These men have clearly demonstrated by their action that they did not so understand it and had no such intention. Those who proposed the amendment in Congress stood stanchly behind the national prohibition act, though that act makes no provision for any such agreement, and the States that ratified the amendment are proceeding upon the theory that no such agreement is required. Utterly unconscious of any such requirement, many of the legislatures that ratified the amendment passed laws for its enforcement that contained no suggestion of the necessity for such an agreement. As these are the men who were authorized to and did act for the people in adopting this amendment, they must be presumed to have known what was intended, and we have a right to assume that their intention and the language they used to express it squares with their actions."

"APPENDIX C.

"Without encumbering the brief by republishing same, the court is respectfully referred to the following decisions of State supreme courts denying the applicability of the referendum to the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution of the United States:

"The Supreme Court of Maine, replying to questions certified to it according to the constitution of that State by the governor, requesting an opinion on his duty to call an election under a petition for referendum for ratification of the eighteenth amendment, held that the legislature, acting under Article V of the Constitution of the United States, was not subject to a referendum, and that provisions of the Maine constitution did not contemplate one. (In re Opinion of Justices (Maine), 105 Atl. Rep., 673.)

"A similar ruling has been made by the Supreme Court of New Mexico, under the provision of its constitution, on mandamus brought against its secretary of state to compel a referendum election submitting a resolution of the Legislature of New Mexico adopting the eighteenth amendment. (State of New Mexico ex rel. v. Martinez (not yet reported).)

"In sustaining a refusal of a mandamus to require the holding of such a referendum election in Oregon, the supreme court held that the constitution of that State for such referendum did not apply to a resolution ratifying an amendment to the Federal Constitution. (Herbring v. Brown, 180 Pac. Rep., 328.)

"Similar rulings upon like cases have been made by the Supreme Courts of Arkansas and Colorado. (Whittemore v. Terral, Ark. (not yet reported); Prior v. Noland, Colo. (not yet reported).)"

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SMOOT:

A bill (S. 4280) for the relief of Adela White; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. HALE:

A bill (S. 4281) granting a pension to William G. Webber (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4282) to increase the pensions of certain persons who were disabled in the line of duty, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. KIRBY:

A bill (S. 4283) granting a pension to Mary C. Reeves (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. McKELLAR:

A bill (S. 4284) to correct the military record of Alfred Clark; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CALDER submitted an amendment authorizing the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to institute and prosecute proceedings in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, holding a district court, for the condemnation of land necessary for the extension of Rittenhouse Street east to Sligo Mill Road, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

ACTIVITIES OF THE FOURTH ASSISTANT POSTMASTER GENERAL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business is closed.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield to me for a moment? There is a resolution lying on the table which was reported yesterday, and I ask unanimous consent for its present consideration. I think it will take only a moment. If it causes any debate, I shall withdraw the request. It is merely a resolution asking certain information from the Postmaster General.

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield for that purpose.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Reading Clerk read the resolution (S. Res. 309) submitted by Mr. KING February 17, 1920, and reported yesterday from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, as follows:

Whereas it has been reported that the Fourth Assistant Postmaster General has circularized hundreds of thousands of agriculturists in the United States, and submitted questionnaires to them relating to divers subjects: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to inform the Senate what authority said Fourth Assistant Postmaster General had for his said action and what appropriation had theretofore been made to cover the expenses of such proceedings upon his part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move that the Senate proceed to consideration of House bill 9369, the Fuller pension bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Harris	McKellar	Smoot
Calder	Harrison	McLean	Spencer
Capper	Henderson	McNary	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Hitchcock	New	Swanson
Comer	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Thomas
Culberson	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Trammell
Dial	Kendrick	Pittman	Underwood
Dillingham	King	Pomerene	Wadsworth
Fernald	Kirby	Ransdell	Warren
Glass	McCormick	Sheppard
Gronna	McCumber	Simmons

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] are absent on official business.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. The names of the absentees will be called.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. REED and Mr. WATSON answered to their names when called.

Mr. BALL, Mr. KEYES, Mr. HALE, Mr. MOSES, Mr. LODGE, Mr. SMITH of South Carolina, and Mr. LENROOT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

PAY OF ARMY AND NAVY AND MARINE CORPS.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from New York [Mr. WADSWORTH]. I notice by the morning press that there is a statement to the effect that the Senate conferees on the Army pay bill are to recede from the Senate provision with regard to pay. Is there any foundation for that statement?

Mr. WADSWORTH. No, Mr. President; there is not.

Mr. PITTMAN. I will state the reason why I made the inquiry. I think the Senate conferees should as far as possible know what the attitude of each Senator will be upon the conference report that may be brought into the Senate. I am very heartily in favor of the bill. I think it is absolutely necessary. I believe that the necessity for a stable Army and a stable Navy is far greater than ever before in the history of the country.

I do not agree with some Senators who feel that we can do without those two organizations, but I believe that all of the military legislation which we have recently been considering will be absolutely futile and will accomplish nothing toward the maintenance of the Navy and the Army unless the provisions of the Senate bill with regard to the pay of officers and men is substantially sustained in the conference report. If it is not substantially sustained, I, for one, am going to vote against the conference report, and I will continue to vote against it until there is sufficient pay provided for officers and men to prevent the disintegration of the Navy and the Army. I do not know so much about the conditions in the Army, but I do know with regard to conditions in the Navy, and the information is derived from the testimony of experts before the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

There is no doubt whatever that unless the pay of officers as well as of enlisted men in the Navy is increased in accordance with the provisions of the Senate bill, the Navy personnel will disintegrate. It is now disintegrating at such a rapid rate that the actual operation of our major fleet is threatened. The prevalence of desertion not only amongst the enlisted men but amongst the petty and sometimes the junior officers is startling; and yet the naval officers who testified before our committee stated they could not in conscience blame these men for deserting if they can not obtain favorable action on their resignations, because the conditions are such that they can not sustain themselves where they have families to support.

On the 20th the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] delivered a convincing speech on this subject. The facts are marshaled and sustained with great force. I wish every Senator and Congressman would read his speech.

I take it that the pay provision is the very essential of the reorganization legislation. The other provisions are an advantage in the reorganization it brings about, but the pay provision is the essential of the whole legislation; and unless the Senate Members of the conference committee succeed in sustaining that provision, then, in my opinion, the whole bill falls; and we might as well vote against the conference report time and time again until that essential provision is sustained.

Mr. WADSWORTH. May I say to the Senator from Nevada that the pay bill is entirely separate from the reorganization bill?

Mr. PITTMAN. Yes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The bill to which the Senator refers merely affects the pay of the Army and the Navy; it does not affect the reorganization of the Army or the Navy at all. The bill for that purpose is an entirely separate one and is in another conference. However, I am in entire sympathy with the Senator from Nevada. Both the Army and the Navy are in desperate straits, and if something is not done—and something substantial must be done—we shall not have an Army or a Navy worthy of the name.

Mr. PITTMAN. But the Army reorganization bill, in my opinion, will be absolutely inoperative unless the pay bill is passed substantially as the Senate has provided.

Mr. WADSWORTH. Unless that be done, it will, at least, be a most ineffective Army.

Mr. PITTMAN. And I think it would be very unfortunate to pass the Army bill, and allow it to go out of the control of Congress in any form that would be inoperative. It would be better to hold it here for months rather than have that occur. Therefore, as one, I will vote against any conference report on the Army reorganization bill until the provisions of the Senate bill with regard to the pay of the officers and enlisted men are substantially agreed to.

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, was the amendment of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] voted on yesterday?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It was not presented after the amendment of the Senator from Colorado was defeated.

Mr. THOMAS. I understood that the Senator from Oregon had offered it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a current opinion among Senators that when an amendment has been presented and printed that constitutes offering it to a bill. It does not. An amendment must be formally offered from the floor. The amendment of the Senator from Oregon is not now pending.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the Senator from Oregon yesterday stated that he had "offered an amendment for the same purpose as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Colorado, but in a different way." It was to strike out the words "during the Civil War," and on page 5971 of the RECORD the proposed amendment appears. My main purpose in taking the floor was to offer to withdraw my amendment in favor of that of the Senator from Oregon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado has been voted on and lost.

Mr. THOMAS. Then, Mr. President, inasmuch as that subject is disposed of, my purpose in taking the floor relates to something that has passed. While I am on my feet, however, I wish to submit a word by way of reply to some of the remarks of the Senator from Oregon on yesterday. The Senator then took vigorous exception to my assertion that political influence was behind and stimulated this and similar appropriation measures, and he asserted that he is supporting the bill and will support similar bills as a matter of principle. I accept the Senator's statement absolutely. He always has the courage of his convictions, and does not hesitate to express them, and I know from his statement that in the advocacy of measures like these he is proceeding according to the dictates of his own judgment and his own interpretation of the duty he owes to the public and to his constituents; but I am unable, Mr. President, to recede from the general assertion which I made. I do not think anyone who has paid much attention to the history of pension legislation since the close of the Civil War can come to any other conclusion, for all measures, or practically all measures of this character, have either had their origin with or have been supported by the organization known as the Grand Army of the Republic, whose legislative committee is interested and has for years been interested, with Congress and elsewhere, in the framework, support, and consummation of legislation of this character.

It was, Mr. President, the beneficiaries of this bill speaking through that organization who pledged themselves in 1918 that if the bill then offered was enacted into law it would make no further demands and ask no further favors from Congress. That being the case, and in view of the activities that have been apparent in the elections in the past against the opponents and in behalf of the proponents of pension legislation by those deriving benefits therefrom, it seems to me that it is a bold man, indeed, who can assert that politics is not largely controlling, if not entirely so, in legislation of this sort.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Has the Senator any assurance that the organization known as the Grand Army of the Republic solicited this increase? Perhaps it was a donation on the part of those who had the legislation in hand out of their generosity and kindness.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am not a member of the Pension Committee, but if my experience is any guide and my correspondence any aid in answering the question I think I can say without much fear of successful contradiction that the organization is behind this measure and doubtless asked for its consideration.

The Senator from Oregon yesterday made the charge that—> the men who are opposing such appropriations because it increases their taxation are not the men who have their little farms and homes with small incomes; they are not the men who earn moderate salaries, as we in the Senate do. They are the extremely rich and the men as a rule who profiteered during the civil and other wars, and who now object to large appropriations to pay to these men who saved and preserved the Union their just dues.

Mr. President, I must confess to a little surprise that so learned and careful a debater as the Senator from Oregon generally is should have made that statement. The objection that is made to increased taxation is not confined to any particular class of taxpayers.

They include the rich and the poor, the just and the unjust, the millionaire and the man who receives a comparatively small income from his business. If it were possible to meet a demand of this sort by placing an assessment upon a certain class of society and then utilize for the purpose the funds so acquired, I could perceive some basis for the Senator's assertion; but, of course, no such system of taxation would for a moment stand the test of the courts. No such system of taxation is possible in a Government like ours. No such system of taxation can consist with equality before the law and with justice as we understand it. The fact is that all this talk about placing the burden of taxation upon the profiteer, however well meant, as a polity has and can have no foundation whatever, for taxes in their ultimate are passed on until they ultimately rest upon the shoulders of consumption. With the exception of inheritance taxes and some elements of income tax, that assertion is universally true, and always has been. It becomes a part of the cost of production and distribution; and instead of mulcting those who have in order to enrich those who have not, we merely drug the intelligence and the consciousness of the real taxpayer by a species of legalized robbery through indirection. Therefore the basis of the Senator's attitude, when subjected to the most superficial analysis, necessarily disappears.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator just a moment?

Mr. THOMAS. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. What was the nature of the tax in Great Britain that fell so heavily upon the men who could pay and the men who ought to have paid to assist in the prosecution of the war that they were finally compelled, as a matter of fact, to dispose of the immense estates, and to put them into circulation, as it were, because of the taxes that were levied upon them? Those taxes did not reach the consumer in the last analysis.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, an enormous tax was placed upon the landholders of Great Britain during the war. In fact, that tax had appreciated very considerably prior to the war in order to meet the additional expenditures of the British Government after the establishment of old-age and similar pensions. That tax was passed on until it became so large that it could not be passed on. It absorbed all or practically all of the income of these huge estates, in consequence of which the owners have been compelled to sell them; but the men who have purchased them must continue to pay that land tax, and of course they have obtained the title to this property at largely reduced rates because of the increased burden. The British Government, like our own, imposed a heavy excess-profits tax, but that, of course, has been added to the cost of production, or the most of it; and there, as here, a very large percentage has been added to the excess-profits tax, whereby it is used as a basis for increased exactions from the average taxpayer.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President——

Mr. THOMAS. I yield.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It was my hope that some such tax as that might be imposed in this country that would dissipate the immense landed estates that exist here.

Mr. THOMAS. It can be done.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It ought to be done; and it has had a beneficial effect in the last analysis in Great Britain, where these estates have been entailed for hundreds of years, nobody deriving any benefit from them except the landowners themselves, and imposing burdens upon the tenants. The dissipation of those immense estates, like the original taxes that were imposed under the Napoleonic régime in France, will redound to the benefit of the country itself in the last analysis, and it ought to be done here.

Mr. THOMAS. It can be done, Mr. President.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It may be done.

Mr. THOMAS. It can be done, and it may be done; but whether it is done or not, the fact does not affect the proposition I am asserting. The only tax that can not be transferred, as far as my judgment and my reading have gone, is the inheritance tax, which is a tax upon capital and which is designed, of course, in addition to obtaining revenue, to put a limitation upon these enormous accumulations which are one of the serious menaces to our social and political future. The proposition I am attempting to discuss is not that the tax should not be imposed—that is another proposition—not that great benefit might not ultimately result from it, but it is not an answer to the expenditure of public money here for reasons which at present are not, in my humble judgment, controlling.

The Senator is very much to be commended for his solicitude for the old veterans of the Civil War, who should not want in their old age, and so am I. I yield to no man in my admiration of the Federal soldier. Like the Senator, I spent my youth in the South, and all of my convictions, my inclinations, and my traditions were for the Confederacy; but I long ago recognized the inestimable value to my own section of the country resulting from its defeat and the debt of obligation due to the soldiers of the United States. We have, however, made ample provision, more than ample provision, to see that not one of these men shall want in his old age.

As I stated day before yesterday, soldiers' homes have multiplied in this country. There are thousands of vacant beds there. Our appropriations for their support are constantly increasing. Sanitation, food, everything that money can accomplish for the accommodation and comfort of these men have been freely extended by the Government of the United States. The Senator by this bill proposes to give a horizontal increase to the millionaire and the pauper, to the man who wants and to the man who does not want; to the man who served 90 days, no matter where that service was; and to the man who served four years; to the man who is disabled, and to the man who is not disabled. We are following the most unfortunate precedent in the matter of pensions that was ever set, and which will soon come home to plague us in the so-called bonus bill, by whatever name it may be ultimately known, which the House at present is incubating.

The Senator expresses his desire to do everything, and more, for the last Army of the United States; and that, too, is commendable. I have no doubt that he saw in this morning's dispatches resolutions recently adopted—yesterday adopted, I think—by the American Legion, in which we are warned that we must not abandon the other three projects for their benefit by the acceptance of the bonus system. They say they must have all four, to wit, bonus, land, vocational training, and Federal aid in the shape of loans. So that the Senate in all probability will have ample opportunity in the course of a few days to consider a measure which in its ultimate scope will tax the resources of this country in my judgment beyond the ability of the people to respond. I do not think it ought to be done. However, I shall not discuss that subject until it is presented to the Senate for our consideration.

Mr. President, I thought it was due to myself, in view of the position which I took on day before yesterday upon this bill, to make this very short reply to my friend the Senator from Oregon, whose friendship I esteem beyond words, and for whose convictions I entertain at all times the utmost respect.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, as a matter of course I know that these pension bills heretofore have passed in spite of all criticism and opposition; but a new condition confronts us right now, and I want to call the attention of the Senate to that new condition.

I find in this bill, in the first paragraph, that there is a blanket provision of $50 per month for all those who participated in the wars the veterans of which are taken care of in this bill; but I find on page 4 the following language:

> This section shall apply to a former widow of any person who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and was honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days, were discharged for or died in service of a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has, or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

Mr. President, there is pending in the House now a measure to grant a bonus to the boys who actually were engaged in warfare for the salvation of this country. We stand aghast at the imposition of the additional tax that will be necessary to meet that temporary bonus.

If our system of pensioning is right, then preeminently those who were actively engaged in service are the ones who should be considered first. If we solemnly enact into law to-day or during this session of Congress a law granting to widows who are the third or fourth removed from their marital relations with men who served pensions at the the rate of $30 per month for the balance of their lives and to the children and grandchildren of those who served in wars that have been over for 50 years, what argument can any man on this floor who votes for it advance against granting to the boys who have just come back from saving the country a pension equal to or exceeding those granted the distantly removed beneficiaries of the veterans of wars that have been fought heretofore? The point I wish to emphasize here is that if we are going to grant pensions to the third and fourth generations of those who fought, to those who had no participation in those wars, it is admitting the principle.

I understand that some of those who were instrumental in framing this legislation have said that these widows are few and old. It does not make any difference, Mr. President, if there was but one; the granting of the pension admits the principle that we have committed ourselves to the granting of a pension to the widow of a soldier regardless of the fact that she has married three or four times or more, or has been divorced, perhaps, without any fault on her part. When you grant her, after all of her subsequent choices of marital relation to other than a soldier, $30 per month, what argument can you use to withhold a pension or bonus to the boy who stood in the mud of the trenches and subjected himself to the unprecedented dangers of modern warfare? There is not a Senator who votes for this measure who can in equity and justice vote against the proposed bonus which is being considered in the House.

It is not a question of the amount involved; it is a question of the principle upon which we have to legislate, and the plea I am making is not on account of the amount involved herein, but owing to the principle which we are extablishing. If our principle, as legislators, with reference to the soldiers, is so profound, so far-reaching, as to take in the beneficiaries or the descendants of those who, by the accident of marriage, have been related to soldiers, what can this country expect to be the burden upon the American people in recognizing that principle for the millions who were engaged in this war?

This bill not only provides for a pension to the old soldiers who were actively engaged, but for anyone who was even in transit going to some isolated point to discharge whatever function it might be at the call of the Government; and not only that, but to the dependents, the widows, and orphans. What will be the burden if we carry that principle out in the coming years for the Army that went abroad and for those who were engaged in the military department at home? It seems to me, Mr. President, that if we are to meet the demands of the boys who have come back from France, we must set a standard right here and now.

I can understand how previous to this war we granted pensions. It was comparatively a small matter in that we were supposed to be legislating for those who, as the years advanced, would rapidly decrease in numbers. But politics entered, and on account of certain divisions in this country the burden did not fall alike everywhere, and therefore there was an added reason to lay it, perhaps. But it was negligible compared with the condition which now confronts us. If you are going to make this bill the standard of the policy of the Government toward its soldiers returned from Europe, the burden of taxation upon the American people can not be met; and what right have you to discriminate?

In what way can you say that those of the Civil War who preserved the Union are to be considered more than those who participated in the saving of the civilization of the world, America included? That bill to grant a bonus of a paltry sum for a temporary length of time will come over to the Senate. This bill establishes the policy of the Government to grant a pension to everyone directly and indirectly connected with the war, and to their descendants, to the third and fourth generation. I am not complaining of that, and I am not criticizing it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator has so often referred to the granting of pensions to descendants of the first, second, third, and fourth generations, that I am led to ask him if he will point out to me where he finds any justification for that assertion either in laws that have been passed or in laws that in all likelihood will be passed. There never has been such a pension law, and there probably never will be such a pension law.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, in reply I want to say that if it does not extend to the third and fourth generations, the late lamented Roosevelt need not despair; there will be no race suicide in this country.

Mr. McCUMBER. That was not the question. I asked the Senator where he found any law as a basis for his reiterated assertion that we are granting pensions to the second and third and fourth generations. There has been no such law, let me tell the Senator, from the very beginning of our pension legislation. The crippled and the infirm, physically or mentally, who were in that condition prior to the age of 16 years, have been placed under the same rules of construction as those governing the granting of pensions to minor children. That is the first generation. It has never gone beyond that in any pension law.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Mr. President, perhaps in saying to the third and fourth generations I was misled in my presentation of the principle applied to a widow four or five or six or seven or eight times removed from her marital relation with the hero of the war.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is wrong there, because if there is a second marriage under the law and under the ruling of the Pension Office the widow is not entitled to her pension.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; if her husband is still living.

Mr. SMOOT. If her husband is dead.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; the Senator is wrong. He has to be living. Here is what the proposed law says. Listen to the wording of it:

> And this section shall apply to a former widow of any person who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and was honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days was discharged for or died in service of a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has, or have been dissolved either by the death of the husband or husbands or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought the Senator was speaking of existing law and not the pending bill.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I am speaking of the provisions of this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is correct as far as this bill is concerned as to remarried widows.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This bill has become more liberal in the face of the splendid condition as to our income and revenue. I suppose it is a contribution to get rid of the burden of prosperity that is upon us. Is that your idea in providing that a widow three or four times removed or divorced shall be the beneficiary of $30 a month after she has had her chance to marry a fortune? I guess a good many of them try that, though I do not know. But when she has had her chance, even whether she got the fortune or did not, if the husband or husbands died she draws $30 a month.

I want to call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact, as he knows and I know, that there is face to face with us now a condition that is appalling as to the taxes the people of the country have to meet. Twenty-six billion dollars of bonds are outstanding, the interest on which has to be met. There will be a tremendous added burden perhaps on the American people by indirect taxation of a guaranty to our transportation system. There are other things which are piling up; and now, in addition to those things, we are establishing a policy in our relation to our soldiers of going to the extreme incorporated in this bill. How will the Senator from Utah, or I, or any other who may by any chance vote for this measure, refuse to grant a like measure to the boys who actually fought, who were denied two years in the productive period of their lives, and taken for the service of their country, carried over to Europe, and who did their work so splendidly and came back to pick up the lines of life where they left them?

Mr. SMOOT. That is a fair question which the Senator asks, and I think it ought to be answered, and if the Senator will yield now, I will try to answer his question.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I would be very glad to hear the Senator answer it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Civil War veteran was not treated the same by the Government of the United States as the soldier in the recent war, and I thank God that the soldier in the recent war was not so treated. His pay was $13 per month. He was paid in currency of about 50 cents on the dollar. His family was never taken care of by the appropriation of a single dollar by the Government. When the first pension was granted him, years after the war, it was $6 a month. The total amount that has been paid in pensions up to date is a little less than $5,000,000,000 to all the Civil War veterans, and in a very few years nearly all of them will be in their graves.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. But the pension roll, if the Senator will allow me right there, is now 659,000.

Mr. SMOOT. Not for the Civil War, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Practically that.

Mr. SMOOT. I know the Senator wants to be perfectly fair. The pensions for Civil War veterans and all their widows, and all of the Spanish War veterans, and all the Mexican War veterans, and the widows left of the Revolutionary War, amount to $214,000,000. That is all it can possibly amount to, because that is all that has been required the past year. The widows are dying at the rate of about 2,500 a month, and the old soldiers will die at the rate of at least 4,000 a month for the next 12 months, and perhaps more than that.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me ask the Senator this question. How many pensioners are on the pension roll to-day as beneficiaries of the Civil War?

Mr. SMOOT. I can tell the Senator in just a moment the exact number.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Both veterans and their dependents.

Mr. SMOOT. Two hundred and seventy-one thousand three hundred and ninety-one survivors, and all other pensioners, 293,000.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the number was 293,000 nearly a year ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. This memorandum says total Civil War pensioners on the roll June 30, 1919.

Mr. SMOOT. That is nearly a year ago.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Survivors, 271,391; widows, and so forth, 226,952.

Mr. SMOOT. That takes in all the others.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The total is 508,343. That means that there are still on the rolls approximately what I said. I was taking the total. I just glanced at the figures. The number of pensioners on the rolls to-day is 568,343.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator must be corrected. That is not the number to-day, but nearly a year ago, and there is quite a little difference.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Have you not added some beneficiaries in the bill that are not covered in this memorandum?

Mr. SMOOT. Only a few have been added on the report of the Committee on Military Affairs by correcting their military records and placing them on the pension rolls.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I do not know anything about the vital statistics connected with this particular business, but it is fair to assume that at least 500,000 will be on the roll that this bill will be called upon to meet.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not think there was any question as to the number. I thought the question of the Senator was as to the amount being paid to them.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. And the Senator said it was $655,000,000.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. No; I spoke of the number. I said that 659,000 are on the rolls.

Mr. SMOOT. I misunderstood the Senator. Then I will proceed.

When the Congress acted in 1917 in relation to the soldiers of the present war, it provided first that every soldier who entered that war should have a family allowance; second, they increased his salary from $15 to $30 a month, with a 10 per cent increase for service while on foreign soil; third, they gave him insurance up to $10,000 in case of death at a rate one-sixth of what any private insurance company would give it to that same soldier. By the way, in passing I might say that that has cost the Government of the United States about a billion dollars.

Again, they provided a compensation for those who were killed or disabled greater than any amount that was ever paid to the Civil War veterans. I do not want it understood that I have complained about these provisions taking care of the soldier in the recent war. I was a member of the subcommittee that passed upon all that legislation. But when we compare the advantages and the benefits extended by the Government of the United States to the soldiers of the present war with those extended to the Civil War veterans, it becomes obvious that whatever is done for the Civil War veterans now, in the last few remaining years of their lives, never will place them upon the same footing with the soldiers of the great war. I think the Senator from South Carolina will admit that.

Another thing I want to say is with reference to the care that was taken of the soldier. His health was looked after and he was provided with all the modern conveniences that a soldier could secure anywhere in the world, whereas in the Civil War no one can read history who will not admit that they passed through trials and suffered even more than death itself, nearly from the beginning to the end of the war.

Mr. McCUMBER. They lived for weeks on hard-tack and water, as compared with confectionery under the present system.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Let me call attention to the fact that that was the best the circumstances then would allow. Our soldiers to-day get no more. Civilization had moved up to a higher plane. It provided for the masses of the people antitoxins and sanitary appliances, and, as a matter of course, our soldiers enjoyed an immunity from hardships that their predecessors suffered. But the soldiers of the Civil War got the best the Government could give them at that time, and the soldiers of this war got no more.

But Senators must not forget the fact that we were also new then in the question and in the policy of granting appropriations for patriotic services. We have also advanced along that line. So the demand is going to be not paralleling conditions of the Civil War veterans but taking up the question under conditions existing right now. The Senator says that we insured the soldier. Of course I knew, and we all knew, that that was an effort on the part of the Government to forestall and make impossible the flood tide that seemed to be inevitable in the way of pensions.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator is perfectly right. Not only was the question of insurance with that in view but the compensation provided for was with that in view, and the allotments and allowances had that very thing in view. When the legislation was up before the Senate I do not remember of a single Senator upon either side of the Chamber who, in defending the provisions, did not say that it was done for the purpose of forever preventing the soldiers of this war from asking for pensions.

Mr. KING. But it has apparently encouraged the demands.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. And yet, if the Senator will allow me, the compensation given for the brief period of the war to the soldier's family while he was engaged abroad, if they were dependent, is a mere bagatelle compared to granting a like amount for the lifetime of those who were dependent.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that the family allowances of the soldiers of the present war will amount to many, many times more than the provisions of the bill will pay to the survivors of the Civil War as long as they live.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Yes; but, taking the number of soldiers and persons engaged in this war and comparing it with the number who survived and came out of the Civil War, the Senator does not pretend to say that the amount paid to the dependents aggregates as much as has been paid since we began the pension system?

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. Exactly; and that is the point I am making.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not want to carry that inference, and I hope that I did not.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. The Senator is drawing a comparison between what this bill will pay and what we temporarily paid, but I am not. What I am arguing is that, though you temporarily supported or contributed to the support of a soldier's family while he was abroad, the Civil War pension roll supports them for a lifetime—that is, contributes to their support. Of course, it does not support them, but it contributes to their support. If that is the policy, we should know it, because these boys could come here and claim that, despite the fact that, they not being killed, their insurance goes on as ordinary life insurance; and in the case of a casualty in civil life they would get just what they would get under ordinary circumstances. Only in the cases of those who were killed the soldiers stood in somewhat of a better relation, perhaps, during this war than in the Civil War, but the temporary contribution to their dependents is not in that class, and should not be compared with the perpetual contribution to the dependents throughout all life.

We have established that as a policy here, and attempted to estop any further pension rolls by our process of insurance. Now, the boys who are carrying that insurance are paying premiums on the insurance. It was granted at a low rate during the war. As I understand, it has been convertible since the war.

The only thing that I am speaking of is that we have gone back to the old policy. We have brought in here an additional $65,000,000 or $75,000,000 and have incorporated into the bill, in my opinion, a ridiculous provision for a widow, having, perhaps, married three or four times and been divorced, getting a pension. If her unfortunate marital attempts have resulted in the death or desertion or divorce of her various husbands, she is still on the pension roll, and so is everyone remotely connected with the war.

One paragraph in the bill reads that if he was en route going to service he shall come under the $50 clause. The argument I am making is that if we establish that policy here we can not deny the boys who are fresh from battle, who have lost two years of their lives in the preparatory and productive part of it, and who are coming back to take up the burden of life with two whole years wiped out and gone, which, like the seed corn, will spell the difference between success and failure. Then we tell them to satisfy themselves with insurance against death and with $30 a month for the time they were in actual service, and they shall be forever thereafter estopped. That is the parallel I am drawing. And mark my prediction: This very bill and those like it are going to be the basis upon which our pension roll will be enlarged beyond the dream of any present to-day.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, may I inquire whether an amendment is in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is in order.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Add after the word "duty," in line 8, page 1, the words "or is now upon the pension rolls as a Civil War veteran," so that it will read:

That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, or is now upon the pension rolls as a Civil War veteran, etc.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is to affect a comparatively few persons who did not serve the full 90 days in the Army, but who, by act of Congress from time to time, on account of their valor or services or some exceptional condition relating to them, have been placed upon the pension roll. Evidently pensioners in that category ought to be allowed to participate in the general pension increase proposed for Civil War veterans. That is the purpose of the amendment.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SPENCER. I yield.

Mr. KING. If I understand the scope of the amendment, it would give a pensionable status under this bill to all those individuals who were deserters and against whom the charge of desertion by legislative enactment has been removed and who have been put upon the pension roll; it would permit them to enjoy the benefits of the pending bill.

Mr. SPENCER. The Senator refers to those who are now on the pension roll?

Mr. KING. Yes.

Mr. SPENCER. Undoubtedly, if a man is now on the pension roll, it would; but it would not open the door to a man who is not now on the pension roll.

Mr. McCUMBER. I will say to the Senator from Missouri that the amendment does not put them in; they are in now.

Mr. SPENCER. Yes; they are in now. The Senator from Utah evidently misconceives the purpose of the amendment. It is not to open the door an inch; it does not put upon the pension roll a man who is not already upon the roll, but it does do a manifest act of justice, for if the general pension is increased, all those who are on the roll ought to participate in that increase.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, then, as I understand, the purpose of the amendment is not merely to protect deserters against whom the charge of desertion has been removed, and who have thereby obtained a pensionable status—for, as I understand the chairman of the committee, those deserters will be benefited under this bill and will also get $50 a month—but it is to cover a different and another class who would not otherwise get this stipend of $600 per year?

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Utah uses the word "deserters." May I say to the Senator that Congress, of course, in passing laws relative to such soldiers, has removed not desertion, but the charge of desertion; Congress has determined by its solemn enactment that those individuals were not deserters. If they were deserters, and Congress, nevertheless, removed the charge of desertion, the fault has been with the Members of Congress who allowed bills of such character to go through.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. McCUMBER. Let me state to the Senator what the only purpose of the amendment is, though I think the Senator offering it has made it quite clear.

I think there have been a few cases—there may not have been a dozen—in which the soldier served less than the required 90 days; he may have served 89 days or 75 days; but there was that in his record by reason of which the Pension Committee, and the Congress acting on the recommendation of the committee, considered that he should be placed upon the pension roll, and he was placed upon the pension roll, for some meritorious conduct or for some other reason, although he served less than the 90 days and although he was not injured. There may be a few of those cases—I think there are—but I do not think there are a dozen of them that are upon the pension roll to-day. As the bill now reads, it refers only to those who have served 90 days or more; and the Senator from Missouri wishes it so amended that it will include in its benefits those who have been placed upon the roll who may have served a little less than the 90 days. I myself see no objection to that, Mr. President.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, of course any observations that may be submitted by any Senator—I beg pardon of the Senator from Missouri; I did not want to take him from the floor.

Mr. SPENCER. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. I shall wait until the Senator concludes.

Mr. SPENCER. I have concluded, unless the Senator from Utah shall suggest some new line of thought, as he frequently does.

[Mr. KING addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CALDER in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The READING CLERK. A bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand from the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] that he thinks he can dispose of his bill in a very few minutes. If that is the case I think it would be in the interest of legislation and the saving of time to lay aside the river and harbor bill temporarily. I so ask unanimous consent that it may be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Washington? Hearing none, the river and harbor bill is temporarily laid aside in order that the pending pension bill may be disposed of. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr .President, the same amendment ought also to be made after the word "duty," on line 12, page 2, in order to make the bill read correctly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, line 12, after the word "duty," insert the words "or is now upon the pension rolls as a Civil War veteran."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. I offer the following amendment and desire to say a word in regard to it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The proposed amendment will be read.

The READING CLERK. Add the following as additional sections at the end of the bill:

SEC. 9. That the provisions of the pension act of May 11, 1912, be, and they are hereby, extended to include the officers and enlisted men of the State militia and other organizations of the several States of the Union that participated and cooperated with the military forces of the United States, under the command of United States officers, during the Civil War, and who actually rendered a service of 90 days or more in any of the said military organizations during said war, and who were honorably discharged therefrom or otherwise honorably relieved from duty under the order of proper military authority.

SEC. 10. That the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of those provided for in section 9 of this act shall be entitled to the same pensions as are now provided by law for the widows, minor children, and dependent parents of the soldiers who were in the Regular service during the Civil War.

SEC. 11. That the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe rules and regulations governing the character of evidence necessary to prove the service herein set forth: Provided, That a certificate of the adjutant general of the State to which the military organizations belonged, showing the date of honorable discharge therefrom, shall be accepted in lieu of the honorable discharge required by the provisions of the act referred to in section 9: Provided further, That the provisions of this act shall not extend to the case of any person wherein the evidence discloses any fact that would have barred him from an honorable discharge had he been in the military service of the United States.

SEC. 12. That title to pension under this act shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions after the passage and approval of this act.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the substance of the amendment has twice passed the House of Representatives and only within the last two or three weeks has been again favorably reported by the committee of the House to the House. It has to do with the militia in several States during the Civil War, mainly in Missouri, but also in Kansas, Kentucky, and a few in Pennsylvania. I think there were none in Ohio. The Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] suggests to me that there may have been some in Ohio.

The facts of the case are simply these: Missouri, where the larger number of militia were, was a border State. After the Civil War had commenced the presence of the militia in the State was the single element which safeguarded our States in the Union. These militia were enrolled as State troops, but they were called into the service of the United States by the Federal Government. They were officered by United States officers. Their pay, their clothing, and their subsistence came from the Federal Government. They served and fought. They in Missouri were in the Battle of Springfield. They repelled the invasion of Gen. Price into Missouri. They were engaged in a countless number of skirmishes and engagements against guerrilla bands and bushwhackers.

They were in every sense serving the Federal Government. All militia serving in the United States from the days of the Revolution to this day have been recognized and pensioned except the militia incident to the Civil War.

I desire to read a single sentence giving the testimony of Abraham Lincoln in connection with this militia service in Missouri. Writing in response to the demand that Gen. Schofield, who was the commander of the Department of the Missouri, be relieved and that the enrolled Missouri Militia be disbanded——

Mr. CURTIS. May I interrupt the Senator?

Mr. SPENCER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. I simply wish to call attention to the fact that the general pension law applied to the State militia of the Civil War up to the year 1875.

Mr. SPENCER. I was about to refer to that. It is true that its discontinuance was owing to a technical ruling of the department.

When the demand for the relief of Gen. Schofield and the disbanding of the Missouri Militia was called to the attention of the President, Abraham Lincoln, he replied as follows:

Few things have been so gratifying to my anxious feelings as when in June last the local force in Missouri aided Gen. Schofield to so promptly send so large a general force to the relief of Gen. Grant, then investing Vicksburg and menaced from without by Gen. Johnston. Was all this wrong? Should the enrolled militia then have been broken up and Gen. Herron detached from Grant to police Missouri? So far from finding cause to object I confess to a sympathy for whatever relieves our general force in Missouri and allows it to serve elsewhere. I therefore, as at present advised, can not attempt the destruction of the enrolled militia in Missouri. I may add that the force being under the national military control, it is also within the proclamation in regard to the habeas corpus.

A. LINCOLN.

The committee of the House close their report with this sentence:

These old militia soldiers, as have all the other soldiers of the Civil War, have died at such a rapid rate in recent years that it is not believed that the enactment of this bill will increase the pension roll more than from three to four thousand in number, and perhaps not that many; in other words, the amount involved is comparatively nominal in view of the enormous amount of money that is being justly paid for pensions now, and the committee is unanimous in its conviction that this act of simple justice to these old militiamen and their widows ought not to be longer delayed.

Mr. President, this body of men represent in Missouri, as I have no doubt they do in the other States, a company of Americans who volunteered for the defense of their country, and valiantly performed, in the hour of their country's need, every duty required.. They saved Missouri to the Union. They are from every standpoint of justice Civil War veterans of the Union. It is unfair—it is without reason, that now, in their declining years, when but few of them are left, when their needs are great, they should longer be denied the recognition which ought years ago to have been granted to them.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I rise to oppose the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri. Of course, the militia is paid in all States, throughout the United States, by special appropriations or otherwise, and their arms, and clothing, and so forth, are furnished by the United States in moderate quantity, and the State militia perform their service within the State where they are recruited; and as militia they are not called to the front, away from home, for long service in fighting the battles of the country, as are those who serve in the Regular and Volunteer service.

The matter is not a new one to me, because for a great many years there have occasionally come before the committees, and especially the Committee on Military Affairs, demands of different natures from different States regarding the militia; perhaps I might say more demands from Pennsylvania than from Missouri. I commenced my service on the Committee on Military Affairs very soon after I came to the Senate. At that time we relied probably more largely upon the venerable Senator from Missouri, Mr. Cockrell, than upon any other Senator or Member of either body of Congress, for knowledge and for wisdom and for advice as to what we should do. And I will say that I never saw a more liberal Senator, in reason, than was that Senator, who served, I believe, as brigadier general or major general in the Confederacy. I remember taking this subject up with him on several occasions, but he was never able to advise the Congress nor the Military Affairs Committee of the Senate that we should put the militia of these States on the same basis as the Volunteer and Regular Army soldiers who served directly in the war.

Of course, if this applies to Missouri—and I admit that Missouri was on the border and received more nearly the shock of battle than most States received—the demands will be just as importunate from other States; from Pennsylvania, where, of course, they were simply enlisted, recorded as to where they would be, and so forth, and that was their service, as we found it to be from evidence that was before us. I do not think they should participate in a service pension of this size. That matter should be treated as being on an entirely different base.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, from my viewpoint, this is not the time or place to discuss the merits of the proposed amendment. I do not think it belongs to this bill; I do not think that we should take it up at this time.

I have been a member of the Committee on Pensions ever since I have been in the Senate, and during all that time we have been confronted with the perplexing question as to what treatment the State militia, who rendered more or less service in connection with the Army of the United States and who were often engaged in protecting Government arsenals and Government railways, should receive at the hands of Congress. The committee has been charged by my genial friend from Utah [Mr. KING], I think, as being too liberal in the granting of special pensions. It may be that we are open to some criticism from that standpoint, but in all our liberality and during all of these years we have not been able to agree by a majority vote in the committee that we should open wide the door to all of those who rendered service as militia, either when they were under the direction of Federal officers or when they performed exactly the same kind of service and were not under Federal officers. I think that that matter will have to be settled at some time and brought to an end in the Committee on Pensions; but it may be, as the criticism is often urged, that at the rate of speed we are making in that direction the proposed beneficiaries will probably all be dead before we get around to it. That also may be a just criticism; but there are many sides to this question, many angles, and it affects many men connected with the militia of many States; for example, as has been indicated by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], the militia of the great State of Pennsylvania, also the Delaware militiamen, who guarded the du Pont Powder Works during the war. It is a serious question and a complex question as to what we should do with reference to these many and diverse organizations. I do not think, however, we ought to settle that question in a general pension bill of this character; and, therefore, I shall oppose the amendment, even though I might support the view of the Senator from Missouri before the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. RANSDELL in the chair). The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. SPENCER].

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, on yesterday I discussed an amendment which had been offered to the bill by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] and an amendment offered by me along the same lines. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado was voted on, but the one I offered was not voted on. I should like now to have my amendment disposed of.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In section 3, on page 2, line 25, after the words "Marine Corps," it is proposed to strike out the words "during the Civil War."

Mr. McCUMBER. Is not that exactly the same amendment that was voted on yesterday?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. It is not quite the same amendment. The amendment of the Senator from Colorado affected the Mexican War veterans and the Spanish War veterans, and the amendment which I now propose affects them and members of the Regular Army.

Mr. McCUMBER. I thought the amendment was exactly the same as that offered by the Senator from Colorado.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from North Daktota that he is informed by the Secretary that the amendment now proposed by the Senator from Oregon is not the same as that previously offered by the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. WARREN. Let the amendment again be stated, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will again state the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 25, after the words "Marine Corps," it is proposed to strike out the words "during the Civil War."

Mr. TOWNSEND. How will it read if amended?

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. So that, if amended as proposed, it would read:

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month,

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment presented by the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN].

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote on the passage of the bill. There are a few Senators who would like to go on record in opposition to this bill, but there is no quorum here. So I shall not ask for a yea-and-nay vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill having been read the third time, the question now is, Shall it pass?

The bill was passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and the War with Mexico, to certain widows, including widows of the War of 1812, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases."

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other puposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the amendment offered by the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brandegee	Curtis	Harris	King
Calder	Dial	Harrison	Kirby
Capper	Dillingham	Jones, Wash.	Lodge
Chamberlain	Glass	Kellogg	McCumber
Culberson	Gronna	Kendrick	McKellar

McNary	Pittman	Smith, S. C.	Underwood
Myers	Pomerene	Smoot	Wadsworth
Nelson	Ransdell	Spencer	Warren
New	Reed	Swanson	Watson
Nugent	Sheppard	Thomas

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-two Senators having answered to their names, there is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The names of the absent Senators were called, and Mr. HALE, Mr. KEYES, and Mr. SUTHERLAND answered to their names when called.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. MCCORMICK, Mr. PHELAN, Mr. PHIPPS, and Mr. LENROOT entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-one Senators having answered to their names, there is a quorum present.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, when the Senate adjourned on yesterday it was considering a proposition in connection with Northwest River, Virginia-North Carolina, an amendment which had been adopted. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] asked unanimous consent that the vote whereby that amendment was adopted be reconsidered. At the time I did not know that he would be absent when the matter came into the Senate, and I objected. In his statement he said that possibly he would be absent when the amendment came into the Senate, and consequently he would like to make his statement at that time.

I do not wish the amendment to be passed on without his presence or without hearing all the objections that he desires to urge against its adoption; and I therefore ask unanimous consent that the vote on that amendment be reconsidered, so that the Senator from Ohio can be present at its disposition.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if that can be done with an amendment pending, I have no objection myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can be done by unanimous consent. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none, and the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to is reconsidered.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, in the address of the Senator from Ohio on yesterday, based on a statement furnished him, he stated that this was not a navigable river; that this amendment was intended merely for drainage purposes; and that only a few people interested in draining the land would be benefited. He did not give himself as the authority for that statement, but he read a statement from Mr. John Seip, of Ohio. I sent a telegram to the parties in Norfolk County who were interested in this amendment, incorporating in it the full statement of Mr. Seip, and telegraphed them to telegraph me an answer to the statement he made, which I have received, and which I ask the Secretary to read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Assistant Secretary read as follows:

PORTSMOUTH, VA., April 22, 1920.

Senator CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
United States Senate Chamber, Washington, D. C.:

John Seip's statement is misleading. He no doubt refers to that portion of Northwest River on upper profile toward its source, which has never been navigable. Of course this should be paid for by private interests, but your bill is another thing, simply to move bars at and near the mouth of the river, where it is now navigable, to admit deeper-draft boats, and this is badly needed and will not benefit drainage. See House Document No. 198, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session, with the map, which will give you full information as to the depth and character of the river.

R. E. B. STEWART.

Mr. SWANSON. Now I will ask the Secretary to read the amendment on page 5, commencing with line 4, to show that that statement is absolutely true.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The amendment proposed by the committee, on page 5, after line 3, is the following:

Northwest River, Va. and N. C.: With a view to securing a channel 6½ feet deep at mean low water and 50 feet wide on the bottom on the bar at the mouth and over the shoal 2 miles above the mouth.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I will state that this is a river 29 miles long. At the mouth of it there is a bar. Two miles from that there is another bar which limits navigation to 4 feet. After passing that bar at the mouth the river becomes 10 feet deep. Then another bar is reached, and if that can be passed I think the water is from 10 to 14 feet deep. This is a survey to ascertain what it will cost to cut a channel through these two bars, and I have had these things read to the Senate to show the character of the attacks that are so frequently made—and I desire to acquit the Senator from Ohio—upon these amendments, in this case to show that it is simply a private enterprise for the purpose of draining land.

On this river there is a bar at the mouth, as I say, and then 2 miles above that there is another bar; and I want to read the report of the engineers to show exactly what the situation is:

Northwest River, about 29 miles in length, rises in the Dismal Swamp of Virginia and North Carolina, flows in a southeasterly direction, and empties into Currituck Sound, N. C. Its slope is gentle and its current moderate. The adjacent territory is generally low and much of it swampy. The lower part is of good navigable width, but the upper part is quite narrow and crooked. A bar at the mouth limits the navigable depth to 4 feet. After crossing the bar a depth of 10 feet exists for a distance of 14 miles, except for one shoal 2 miles above the mouth, on which the depth is 6 feet. Above the 14-mile point both width and depth diminish.

The object of this amendment is simply to get a survey, not an appropriation, to ascertain from the Government engineers what it will cost to provide a 6½-foot depth at mean low water and a channel 50 feet wide on these two bars, where the navigation is now limited to 4 feet on account of the two bars.

The statement was made here yesterday, based on this misleading statement furnished to the Senator from Ohio, that this was an effort to drain that entire river of 29 miles at the expense of the Government to give drainage to swamp lands. What is the situation? In 1916 Senator MARTIN got through the Senate a provision for making a report and survey on Northwest River as far as practicable for navigation. The engineers made a report at that time. They did not think any appropriation should be made. That report was made by the local lieutenant colonel, J. B. Jervey, a distinguished officer, a great engineer with a splendid record, and a man of as high character as this Government can furnish. He reported that under those conditions they should not make any improvements, but in his report he made the recommendation which I am about to read, basing his report on the fact that there were two shoals on this river, one at the mouth limiting navigation to 4 feet, and 2 miles above it another shoal, and after you got across these two shoals you would have a depth of 10 to 15 feet in the river. He made a recommendation which is as follows:

It is, therefore, recommended that a survey of the bar at the mouth of Northwest River and of the shoal 2 miles above its mouth be authorized, in order to determine the cost of dredging channel 6½ feet deep at mean low water and 50 feet wide on the bottom at these points.

This amendment is in the exact language, word for word and letter for letter, that the district engineer reported. That report went to the chief of the board. He recommended that no appropriation should be made at that time, but he recommended that a survey should be made to ascertain whether the public interest and the commerce were sufficient to justify a channel between these two shoals, and what the cost was. That recommendation went to the general board. The general board sustained his report in connection with not making any improvements at that time, and said nothing about the survey. Gen. Black transmitted it, and I can see why he neither recommended the improvements nor the survey. During the war Senator Martin, who had charge of this matter and was on the committee, did not think it was proper or necessary to have this survey.

What is this proposition? Here is a river 29 miles long. People call these streams creeks or rivers. It has a large volume of water. It is in a populous section of the country. Boats go there now with a draft of 4 feet. What they ask is to have a channel cut through these two shoals 6½ feet deep, provided that on a survey of the river it is found that there are enough people interested and the cost is not too great.

That is a very different proposition, is it not, from dredging a river 29 miles to drain land? I should like to know how cutting a channel through two shoals 40 or 50 feet broad and 6 feet deep will drain anything. It can not lower the water at all. All that it will do is to take out the mud in the shoal and make it possible for boats drawing 6 feet to navigate the stream.

That is the proposition contained in this amendment. A large portion of the population of the county met in a mass meeting attended by officers of the county, members of the legislature, showing the great public interest, and asked to have a survey made, which had been recommended; and the amendment is in the language of the recommendation of the district engineer, merely asking to have this survey made. It is impossible to get the appropriation until the survey is made. The survey never has been made to find out what it would cost to remove these two shoals. Nobody knows whether it would cost $10,000, $20,000, $30,000, or $5,000, and the engineer recommended it.

There is not at the present time any very large business there. There is some lumber business and some farm business, but you can not have much business with a 4-foot channel. The record shows that the amount of business there was not sufficient to justify the improvement for the 29 miles, but the engineer recommended that a survey should be made to ascertain what it would cost to have these shoals opened and a depth of 6½ feet provided. I do not believe there is in this bill a more reasonable proposition than this—to have this survey made with a view of determining whether the public interest would be subserved by opening up these shoals.

In addition to that, this is a great truck country all through Norfolk County. I do not know to what extent these farms are part of it. I suppose the greatest trucking community in the world is Norfolk County. They are compelled to depend on water transportation. It is nearly impossible to build roads in that country, with its water conditions, without its being almost impracticable on account of the cost. They rely on water transportation. You can not develop that until you get 6 or 6½ feet; and it seems to me that with the length of the river and the number of people interested it is but a reasonable proposition to carry out the recommendation of the local engineer that this survey should be permitted.

I hope, therefore, the Senate will allow the survey to be made to ascertain whether these two shoals, one at the mouth and the other 2 miles above the mouth, should be removed so that a 6½-foot channel can be obtained.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President, as I stated on yesterday, the only information I had was that gleaned from the statement which I introduced in the RECORD, as supplemented by some conversation which I had with Mr. Seip.

During the morning I took occasion to investigate the facts somewhat further. I think that when Mr. Seip made the statement that the stream was not at all navigable he overstated the situation a little; but the investigation which I have made demonstrates to my entire satisfaction that it is mighty poor business for the Government of the United States to embark in a proposition of this kind at this time.

The first investigation that was made of this alleged river, so far as I have been able to find out, was in 1890, and the report of the investigation which was made at that time is referred to in one of the later reports. I want to read a paragraph from Document 198, to which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] has referred. I read from page 4:

A preliminary examination of this stream was made in 1891 by Capt. (now Col.) G. J. Fiebeger, in accordance with a provision in the river and harbor act approved September 19, 1890. Capt. Fiebeger's report containing an unfavorable recommendation is printed in the annual report of the Chief of Engineers for 1891, part 2, page 1321.

So far as I have been able, in the short time at my disposal, to investigate this subject, I find that it again claimed the attention of Congress July 26, 1917, when this amendment was proposed and adopted:

From at or near Woodward's Bridge upstream, so flat lighters, etc., may ascend, with a width of channel of not less than 40 feet, as far as the Cornland Causeway Road or beyond that point as far as practicable, and to take into consideration any proposition for the cooperation on the part of local or State interests for the payment of one-half the expense of this project, and to report the possible utility of the whole river, from its mouth to its source, if adequately improved to meet the requirements of its connecting waters, for the national defense.

Evidently, in pursuance of this action by the Congress, this subject was again taken up in the War Department, and a report was made in the Sixty-fifth Congress, at the first session, in this document, No. 198. Under date of June 18, 1917, Brig. Gen. Black made a report, and I read a sentence or two from it:

The district officer states that the improvement of the part of the river above the Norfolk Southern Railroad bridge, 14.1 miles above the mouth, would be expensive and the cost would be out of proportion to the benefits to be derived, but he believes that the lower part of the river is worthy of improvement to the extent of dredging a channel 6½ feet deep at mean low water and 50 feet wide on the bottom, and he recommends a survey to determine the cost of this improvement. The division engineer is of opinion that the improvement of this river is not advisable at the present time.

Again the board says:

This report has been referred, as required by law, to the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and attention is invited to its report herewith, dated May 15, 1917. The board states that the commerce on this waterway is not large, that it consists chiefly of floated logs and timber, that existing facilities are fairly adequate for this class of traffic, and that the desired improvement would not result in benefits commensurate with the cost.

Then they concur in this report. Col. Frederic V. Abbot, of the Corps of Engineers, and senior member of the board, under date of May 15, 1917, said this in describing the Northwest River:

The adjacent territory is generally low and much of it swampy. The lower part is of good navigable width, but the upper part is quite narrow and crooked. A bar at the mouth limits the navigable depth to 4 feet. After crossing the bar a depth of 10 feet exists for a distance of 14 miles, except for one shoal 2 miles above the mouth, on which the depth is 6 feet. Above the 14-mile point both width and depth diminish.

The principal traffic now on the river consists of rafts of logs and piling. There is also some barging of logs and occasionally a small boat load of fertilizer or building material. The commerce amounted to 44,051 tons in 1915 and 30,209 tons in nine and one-half months of 1916.

Now, note:

There is no apparent prospects of any material increase.

Then reading further, not reading the entire report:

The district officer believes that any improvement above the Norfolk Southern Railroad bridge would be unduly expensive, but that the commerce is sufficient to justify improvement below that point. He therefore recommends a survey and estimate. The division engineer is of opinion that the locality is not worthy of improvement at this time.

Then he adds:

The commerce on this waterway is not large and it consists chiefly of floated logs and timber. Existing facilities are fairly adequate for this class of traffic. The character of the country adjacent is such that no commercial development, which will tend to create a general commerce of importance, can reasonably be anticipated. It is not believed that the desired improvement would result in benefits commensurate with the cost. In view of these facts the board concurs with the division engineer in the opinion that it is not advisable for the United States to undertake the improvement of Northwest River, Va. and N. C., at this time.

On page 5 there is a repetition of a statement made by Col. Jervey, in which he says with regard to this river:

Occasionally a small boatload of fertilizer or building material is carried as far upstream as the Woodward Bridge.

Col. Judson, whom we know, formerly one of the District Commissioners here, a lieutenant colonel, Corps of Engineers, who was division engineer, said:

In my opinion it is at least doubtful whether the annual benefits to commerce would equal interest upon cost of improvement plus maintenance.

And here is a further statement of the amount of traffic. It is so inconsequentially small that I am a good deal surprised that an enterprise of this kind could be urged at this time.

It is said that there is a good deal of truck raised in that vicinity. There is not any evidence that it is transported on this river. One of these reports refers to the fact that there is a canal running from the Dismal Swamp to some destination down there, on which a good deal of the water traffic is carried; but it is not carried on this river. Then somebody is asked to give an estimate as to the amount which may be for distribution. A letter of the Richmond Cedar Works, under date of January 3, 1917, calls attention to the fact that there will probably be about 900,000 to 1,000,000 feet, Doyle's rule measure, of lumber per month if the improvements are put in. What would that amount to as a matter of traffic in a community?

Now, I want to call attention to the fact that these different reports were made under a river and harbor bill, which suggested that they inquire into the prospect of getting the State or the local authorities to pay a half of the cost. There is not anything here to indicate that they are interested in that part of it, and, in fact, as I shall call to your attention, there has not been anything done so far as getting the local authorities to pay this cost. They say again:

Below we beg to submit the best compilation of products shipped and received for distribution in section contiguous to Northwest River.

It does not say it will go down this river. I do not know how far back contiguity extends. There is one item of 60,000 bushels of corn, another of 25,000 bushels of Irish potatoes, another of 400 barrels of kale, another of 200 barrels of spinach, and a number of items of that kind.

Let me go further into the next report. A subsequent report was made, at the second session of the Sixty-fifth Congress. I read from Document No. 1137 of the House of Representatives, and here again Maj. Gen. Black, under date of May 23, 1918, makes the statement. This is just about two years ago. At that time, after making an investigation, he said—and I read only in part—under date of May 23, 1918:

The principal traffic now on the river consists of rafts of logs and piling, and occasionally a small boatload of fertilizer is carried as far upstream as Woodwards Bridge.

Now note this:

Property owners appear to regard the improvement for drainage of more importance than for navigation. No definite offer of cooperation on the part of local or State interests has been received. In the opinion of the district engineer the improvement of Northwest River above Woodwards Bridge for purposes of navigation would be far too expensive in comparison with the purely local benefits which would be derived therefrom. He believes that the whole river would have no value for the national defense if adequately improved to meet the requirements of its connecting waters, and he reaches the conclusion that the stream is not worthy of improvement by the United States at the present time.

* * * * * * *

After due consideration of the above-mentioned reports, I concur in the views of the district engineer, the division engineer, and the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, and therefore report that the improvement by the United States of Northwest River, Virginia-North Carolina, is not deemed advisable at the present time.

W. M. BLACK, Major General.

Mr. RANSDELL. What is the date?

Mr. POMERENE. It is dated May 23, 1918.

Attached to this is a report by William T. Rossell, brigadier general, United States Army, retired, senior member present, who says under date of April 9, 1918:

It appears that property owners regard the improvement for drainage of more importance than for navigation.

I submit that Mr. Seip was almost right when he made this statement that these people were interested in this subject more as a matter of private enterprise than they were for matters of transportation.

I do not care to take the time of the Senate to read very much further, but there are one or two of the paragraphs here that I wish to read. On page 6 there is this statement:

The portion of the river below the Norfolk Southern bridge is a very usable stream in its present condition, but its navigable depth is limited by the shoals at its mouth, mentioned in the preceding paragraph. Above the Norfolk Southern Railroad bridge the river divides into several channels, and the bends are so numerous and sharp that it is impossible to represent them on a small-scale map. In making the examination, it was possible to navigate a 16-foot launch up to within a half a mile of Bunch Walnut Bridge. A skiff was pushed up practically to the bridge by lifting it over the logs. Above this point it was so obstructed by logs and brush, and the adjacent banks were so swampy, that it was impossible to trace it farther.

On page 7 Peter C. Hains, major general, district engineer, said:

The improvement of Northwest River above Woodwards Bridge for purposes of navigation would be far too expensive to compensate for the benefits that would be derived therefrom, which would be purely local. The contiguous country is now served by the Dismal Swamp Canal—which gives direct water transportation to Norfolk or Elizabeth City. It is therefore believed that this part of the waterway is not worthy of improvement at this time for purposes of navigation. The improvement of the part of the river covered by this report would be of no benefit to commerce unless the part of the river from Woodwards Bridge to the mouth were also improved.

That is what I referred to a moment ago—

It was determined from this examination that the prime reason that the property owners have in asking the Government to improve the Northwest River above Woodwards Bridge is to improve the drainage of their lands. This is considered a more important feature for present consideration than the question of navigation.

Mr. President, it may be that a few shallow boats may get up there, particularly if this shoal is dug out, but I take it from these three investigations, all of which have been adverse, that the Engineer Department must have information sufficient now to justify them in coming to a conclusion as to whether it is the policy at the present time, in view of many great projects which are pending uncompleted, in great river valleys where they do not have to wait for commerce to grow up, but where the commerce is waiting for the opportunities for transportation. I do not think it is wise to go into a matter of that kind. In these reports from which I have read, though the Congress said in 1917, "Inquire as to whether or not the people in that vicinity are willing to do anything looking toward a participation in the payment of the expense," not one word has been said on that subject.

I think you will find further, in investigation of this report, that nearly all of this land is swampy, with a little timber on either side of it, and there is a question in the minds of the engineers as to whether it should be cut off at once and floated down. One of the engineers makes the statement—I will not take the time to refer to his exact language, but investigation will bear out my statement—that so far as it is necessary to have water transporation for the logs, they have it now, and it is not necessary to deepen the channel for that purpose.

Mr. President, this is a matter of no personal interest to me at all; it came up to me yesterday for the first time; but I think it is projects of this kind that have helped to discredit in some measure the river and harbor bill. I think with the information they have they can tell what the cost is, if that becomes necessary, and in view of the statement that was made that there is not transportation enough there now to pay the interest on the cost plus the cost of maintenance, I can not see why we should go ahead with a proposition of this kind at the present time.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have listened to the statement of the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and it is a remarkable statement. It is about as far from the issue in this case as any I ever heard. I tried to make it clear that in 1916 a proposition was before the Senate to improve the river 24 miles and to ascertain whether the commerce was sufficient to justify it and whether the public interest would be justified in doing that. That was reported adversely, as to the upper part of the river. As is said in the telegram which I read here, that would be largely for drainage purposes.

But the very engineers' report that the Senator has read recommended what?—just what this amendment provides for. The amendment proposed is not to improve the river 24 miles, but everything the Senator read would leave the impression in the Senate and elsewhere that the proposition was to improve the river 24 miles. The Senator never departed from that thought. He never read anything except against the proposition to improve the river 24 miles.

What did the engineers recommend in the very report from which the Senator read? They said that the commerce and the public interest did not justify improving the river for 24 miles, but what did they recommend? They said that at the mouth of the river there is a 4-foot bar and that nothing but a boat of 4-foot draft could go over it, and that 2 miles above that there is another bar 6 feet deep and for a 6-foot boat to go over it, it would have to be 6½ feet deep to give half a foot under the bottom of the boat. But the Senator knows full well, if boats are going over there, we can not have any commerce unless it is in a 6-foot boat. A 6½-foot boat can not go farther up there.

Mr. POMERENE. But as preliminary to the boat you must have a river.

Mr. SWANSON. They have a river, and I just want to say that in this case some people have more zeal than knowledge. If they had knowledge they would be all right. What is the Senator's zeal? It is regarding the improvement of the river for 24 miles. What did we ask? We asked exactly what was recommended by the very report from which the Senator read.

We have had a survey of the bar at the mouth of the river, over which the boats go in commerce, and we must make it 2 feet deeper. Two miles above there is another bar, 6 feet deep, and the proposition is to make that a half a foot deeper, so that a 6-foot boat could go over the 6½-foot bar. That is all that is involved there; and yet the Senator comes here and reads a report appearing that this was a proposition to improve 24 miles of river. That has been abandoned, and there is no effort to do that, but the engineers recommended that the commercial conditions were such as to justify a survey to ascertain what it would cost, and when that cost comes in, what then? That the very commerce itself that is already there, if the expense is not too great, may simply cross these two bars.

I would like to have the Senator explain how any drainage can come from crossing two bars. It is not reducing the level of the water at all, but simply taking out a portion of the bar to make the water 6½ feet deep at that point. He talks like this was a drainage proposition. The Senator knows that that can not occur. Why does he talk about drainage?

This is simply the proposition that has been recommended. We did not press the other because the war was on. Commerce is growing there, and that section of the country is developing; there has been a big development, and we are entitled to have the engineers say whether conditions justify digging 2 feet deeper on one bar and on the other bar a half a foot deeper and having an estimate made of the cost, and then to say whether the Government is justified in doing it.

Mr. TOWNSEND. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. What particular benefit does the Senator expect to get out of this improvement if he has his way about it and the channel is deepened for 4 miles up from the mouth of the river?

Mr. SWANSON. It is not 4 miles; it is 14 miles. At the mouth of the river there is a bar on which we only get 4 feet of water. When we cross that, for 14 miles we have 10 feet of water, and then another little bar, which is only 6 feet; and this is a proposition for a channel 6½ feet through those two bars; that is all.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Is there commerce along that distance to justify it?

Mr. SWANSON. They have commerce enough there now to justify what this little cost will involve. They make a report as to the extent private interests will contribute in dredging it out.

Mr. TOWNSEND. This is not a case of the camel getting his head under the tent?

Mr. SWANSON. Not at all. The engineers have reported against the river improvement, but they have reported that these two bars, that will cost very little money, justify a survey to see what they would cost. All that is asked is just for these two bars.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, coming from a part of the country where improvements of rivers and harbors are essential to the commerce of the Nation, I am naturally very deeply interested in this measure. I am a member of the Committee on Commerce, which reported the bill, and before voting for the bill in its present form gave much thought and study to the whole subject.

I have always favored river and harbor improvements. I have differentiated between rivers and harbors and creeks and brooks and little streams in some parts of the country that really ought not to be improved. I have always believed that money properly spent in rivers and harbors is a good investment for the United States; and when this bill came from the other House with an authorization for the expenditure of $12,000,000 this year, I felt, with other members of the Committee on Commerce, that the sum was entirely too small to carry on the work essential for the needs of commerce and for the proper development and improvement of our rivers and harbors during the next year.

I know, Mr. President, that there has been a considerable amount of money in the unexpended balances; I know that it was something over $50,000,000 late last year, although the sum was materially reduced early this year, and, as I understand, on February 1 was approximately $30,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I might state to the Senator that I have made inquiries in reference to this matter; in fact, we had Col. Taylor before the committee, and he stated that on the 1st of February the fifty-nine or sixty million dollars which was on hand the 1st of November last had been reduced to $36,000,000. It is being reduced at the rate of about $5,000,000 a month, and there is no reason to suppose that the expenditures during the next three or four or five months will be less than they have been during the last three or four or five months. In fact, the last four or five months included the winter months, and we may expect the expenditures, if anything, to be greater during the succeeding months. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that if the expenditure continues at the rate that it is now proceeding we shall have on hand on the 1st of July about $12,000,000 for all the projects throughout the entire country. If we should appropriate $20,000,000, that would make the total amount available $32,000,000, and at the same rate of expenditure on the 1st of January next we should have only $2,000,000 left to carry on the work of the improvement of rivers and harbors prior to the passage of the next river and harbor bill, which we expect to be by the 4th of next March. That, briefly, shows the present situation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, if the chairman of the committee will permit me, I should like to supplement the statement which he has made with reference to the amount that will be on hand available for improvement purposes at the time the money appropriated by the pending bill becomes available. It is true, as the Senator from Washington has said, that Col. Taylor, representing the Engineer Department, stated that when the money provided for in this bill became available there would only be between twelve and thirteen million dollars coming over from former appropriations which could be applied for all of the projects which have been approved by Congress and for which appropriations have been made by Congress.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. But Col. Taylor also stated that for the items contained in his last estimate of $19,000,000 there would be available from old appropriations when the money in this bill is available only about $7,000,000, so that for the items for which we are appropriating—and although the bill carries a lump sum, it is understood that we are appropriating for the items that were included in Col. Taylor's estimate—for those items there will only be available under old appropriations $7,000,000 when the money provided for in this bill becomes available.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CALDER. I do.

Mr. HARRISON. I am not a member of the Commerce Committee, as are the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER]. The Senator from North Carolina says that the projects which have been recommended by Col. Taylor of the Board of Army Engineers are to be taken care of under the proposed lump-sum appropriation according to the estimate submitted. To which of the estimates does the Senator refer? There have been about three made, I think, by the Board of Engineers. One submitted to the House of Representatives recommended an appropriation of about $43,000,000, as I recall, and another one called for a somewhat smaller amount.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I was speaking about the revised estimate, which was for $19,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; $19,000,000 for improvements and $5,000,000 for maintenance, making $24,000,000 in all.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. HARRISON. But that eliminates a great many projects that the Board of Army Engineers stated in their report to the House Committee on Rivers and Harbors should be provided for. That is my impression about it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Col. Taylor, as I remember—and the chairman of the committee will correct me if I am in error—stated that the $19,000,000 which he had estimated for certain items contained in the bill was urgently needed, and that with that $19,000,000 the work could be done that the immediate requirements of commerce demanded.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator said $19,000,000 was actually necessary. As I recall, Col. Taylor recommended $19,000,000 for improvements and $5,000,000 for maintenance, making a total of $24,000,000.

Mr. SIMMONS. I was confining my statement to the work of improvement, for which there was estimated $19,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; and then $5,000,000 was estimated for maintenance.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator from New York yield to me?

Mr. CALDER. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The first estimate, including some supplemental estimates that came down from the engineers, was that $44,000,000, in round numbers, was required for all the projects that had been authorized by Congress, and which had been undertaken. Then, practically upon the statement of fact as made on yesterday by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], as to the attitude of the committee and its desire to hold down the appropriations as low as they could under the policy they believed they ought to follow, the engineer revised his estimates, and, leaving out certain appropriations that he thought could be left out, recommended $22,000,000 for improvements and $5,000,000 for maintenance, or $27,000,000 altogether. That was further revised as to the improvement items, so that the estimate as finally submitted stated that there would be required for improvements $19,000,000 and for maintenance $5,000,000, or a total of $24,000,000 for both.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the statement which I made a moment ago relative to the money available for all projects all over the country, the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] is correct, that for the particular projects in this revised list there will probably be available on the 1st of July, when the fiscal year begins, about $7,000,000; but for all the projects of the country which have been authorized, if the rate of expenditure goes on at the same rate that it now is, there will be about $12,000,000 available the 1st of July. If we should add $20,000,000, that will make $32,000,000. If the expenditure continues at the same rate as at present, then by the 1st of January for all projects, not only those on the revised list which were supposed to be taken care of by this bill, but for all other projects, there would be but $2,000,000 available.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator also ought to make it clear that money appropriated for one project can not be applied to another project.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; money that has been heretofore appropriated for a particular project can not be diverted from that project to others.

Mr. REED. But is not this the case, if the Senator from New York will pardon me——

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. REED. That the engineers reported $24,000,000 as a minimum, and then the committee of the House reduced that minimum to $12,000,000, and the Senate committee raised the $12,000,000 to $20,000,000; so that there is a hiatus of $4,000,000 or $4,500,000 between the amount recommended by the Senate committee and the amount recommended by the Board of Engineers?

Now, is not this the situation, that in using the money thus appropriated, the amount being four and a half million dollars short of the minimum appropriation required, the Board of Engineers in its discretion as to where the money is most necessary may, if it so desires, fail entirely to use any of the money on certain of the projects which have been heretofore approved? That board can do that if it wants to. Is not that the case?

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is true.

Mr. REED. And is not the board very likely to do that; in fact, is it not almost compelled to do it?

Mr. JONES of Washington. According to their estimates, the board will have to leave out some of the projects even on the revised list. There will have to be some of them left out; there is no question about that.

Mr. REED. So that the Mississippi River is liable to be left without anything except the money that is left over from former appropriations?

Mr. JONES of Washington. While that is possible, I do not think it will happen. The engineers in their revised list estimate $500,000 for the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Ohio to St. Louis; they estimate $1,200,000, I think—either that or $600,000, I am not sure about that, but I think it is $1,200,000—for the Mississippi River from St. Louis to St. Paul and $600,000 for the Missouri River. If we appropriate $20,000,000, the engineers may use—and I think very likely will use—of that amount $500,000 on the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Ohio and St. Louis, $1,200,000, or whatever the amount may be on the revised list, on the Mississippi River up to St. Paul, Minn., and $600,000 on the Missouri.

There is no attempt at concealment about this matter; I wish to be perfectly frank and perfectly fair, and I tried to set it out fully in the report so that everybody will have the facts, but with the $20,000,000 which we propose to appropriate there is not any reason, in my judgment, why the engineers should not use $600,000 on the Missouri River.

They say in their letter to me, in their final conclusion, that by leaving out other items, small items not referred to in their letter, they might get along with $18,000,000, and take care of the Ohio, of Savannah Harbor, I think, and of the other improvements referred to by them, including $1,000,000 on the East River at New York, $2,000,000 for the Delaware, and so on. We have allowed a further sum of $2,000,000, out of which they can take $600,000 for the Missouri and $1,400,000 for some other projects; but, as the Senator has said, they could go through the year without applying money to those projects. Col. Taylor said, however, that they would consider themselves to an extent morally bound to use whatever money we appropriated upon the projects mentioned in their revised list, but that if an emergency should arise in connection with any project outside of those on the list, requiring the expenditure of some money, they would feel justified, of course, in using, and would have the authority to use, some of this money for that purpose, although they would not use any of the money for any project not mentioned on their revised list except in case of emergency demanding it. That, in brief, is the situation, as I understand it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, of course I do not want to press this matter to interfere with the Senator from New York.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from New York has the floor.

Mr. REED. But I wish to get it cleared up, and this is, perhaps, as good a time to do so as any other. The report of the minimum amount that the Army engineers were finally—I will not say coerced—induced to bring in in accordance with the plan, which meant, to use common language, cutting to the bone, was $24,500,000. Is that right?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Something like $24,000,000; I do not recall the exact figure.

Mr. REED. That included maintenance?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that included maintenance.

Mr. REED. That included maintenance of $5,000,000?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. REED. The House, with that report before it, cut the appropriation to $12,000,000. That is the amount carried in the bill as it came to the Senate. That is correct, is it not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. REED. Then, the Senate committee took hold of it, and the result was that the Senator in charge of the bill wrote the letter to which I referred yesterday, which proposed a new estimate suggesting certain reductions in the bill. I want to put them into my question, because I desire this question to mean something in the RECORD.

East River and Hell Gate, reduce to $1,000,000—

It had been, I think, $3,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. $3,200,000.

Mr. REED. The next recommendation was:

Shrewsbury River, omit entirely.
Delaware River, reduce to $1,000,000—

What had that estimate been?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Two million dollars.

Mr. REED. The next item was:

Chesapeake and Delaware Canal, omit entirely—

What had that estimate been?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Two million dollars, and the revised estimate was reduced to $1,000,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Norfolk Harbor, omit entirely.

What had that been?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that was either three or four hundred thousand dollars. I will tell the Senator in just a moment.

Mr. CALDER. The original estimate was $1,000,000. The revised estimate was $400,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Savannah Harbor, omit entirely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The revised estimate was $300,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Brunswick Harbor, omit entirely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Both the original and revised estimates were $200,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Hillsboro Bay, omit entirely.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The revised estimate in that case was $260,000.

Mr. REED. What was it before?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Four hundred and forty-six thousand five hundred dollars.

Mr. REED (reading):

Southwest Pass, reduce to $600,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That, I think, was $1,600,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Mississippi River——

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Mississippi between the Ohio and the Missouri was $750,000; the revised estimate was $500,000.

Mr. REED. What was the rest of the Misissippi River?

Mr. JONES of Washington. In the case of the Mississippi River to St. Paul, the original estimate was $2,000,000 and the revised estimate was $1,200,000. In the case of the Missouri River, the original estimate was $1,860,000 and the revised estimate $600,000.

Mr. REED. Now, your proposition on those three items which you asked the board to consider was as follows:

Mississippi River, Missouri River to St. Paul.

The Missouri River does not run to St. Paul. It should have read—

Missouri River, and Mississippi River to St. Paul.

That would be the correct language.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It means the Mississippi River to St. Paul; yes. It says: "Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, $1,200,000," and then, "for the Missouri River, $600,000."

Mr. REED. Then, that means the Mississippi River, from St. Louis to St. Paul, $1,200,000, and the Missouri River, $600,000?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. REED. Now you propose, in the next item, to omit the Missouri altogether.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That was the suggestion that I said had been made in the committee.

Mr. REED. I am just trying to get the basis of their action. The item for the Mississippi River to St. Paul was to be reduced to $600,000. Then—

Cumberland River below Nashville, omit entirely.

How much was that?

Mr JONES of Washington. The revised estimate was $300,000.

Mr. REED. And what was it before that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. $460,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Ohio River, locks and dams, omit entirely.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. REED. Just let me finish this.

Mr. HARRISON. I simply want to know what the Senator from Washington is reading from. I have another estimate here which has a much larger sum than the Senator from Washington has given.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I am reading from a statement prepared by the chairman of the House committee and appearing in the report of the committee, and I will say that Col. Taylor stated that this was substantially correct. It may not be exactly correct in every item, but he said that it was substantially correct. This was prepared by the chairman of the House committee.

In the case of the Ohio River, the original estimate was $5,000,000 and the revised estimate was $1,000,000.

Mr. REED. I want to get this in somewhat concrete form. Let me pursue this method—I am nearly through—and I will thank the Senator from Mississippi if he will put into the RECORD the figures to which he refers in a moment, after I have concluded these questions.

Mr. HARRISON. I expect to do so. I just wanted to know what estimate it was that the Senator from Washington was reading from.

Mr. REED (reading):

Ohio River, locks and dams, omit entirely.

What was the estimate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The original estimate was $5,000,000 and the revised estimate $1,000,000.

Mr. REED (reading):

Milwaukee outer harbor, omit entirely.

How much was that?

Mr. JONES of Washington. One hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars.

Mr. REED. Rouge River?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Two hundred and seventy-three thousand dollars, I think. There was no original estimate for the Rouge River. That came down, however, as a supplemental estimate—$273,000.

Mr. REED. It is a little wearisome, but there are not very many people here but just us folks, and let me follow this for a moment. Will the Senator now give me the final revised estimate for the Missouri River?

Mr. JONES of Washington. The revised estimate for the Missouri River was $600,000.

Mr. REED. Now the estimate for the upper Mississippi?

Mr. JONES of Washington. One million two hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. REED. And for the lower Mississippi?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Five hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. REED. That is an aggregate of $2,200,000. Now, the proposition that you made was to reduce that entire amount to $600,000, and——

Mr. JONES of Washington. Oh, no, no! The Senator is mistaken about that, according to my recollection. We did not cut out $500,000 below St. Louis to the Ohio. This is what was proposed:

Mississippi River, Missouri River, to St. Paul, reduce to $600,000.

That was a reduction of $600,000.

Missouri River, omit entirely.

That was a further reduction of $600,000. That would be $1,200,000 reduction.

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There was not any proposal or suggestion made to reduce the amount of the revised estimate from St. Louis down to the mouth of the Ohio.

Mr. REED. Now, the engineers reported on these various suggestions, and they said that they could not get along without the money required on all of these projects which you mentioned in your letter, as follows—let me call the attention of the Senator from Minnesota to this. I hope he will stay for a moment.

They said they could not get along without the appropriations for the Delaware River, Norfolk Harbor, Savannah Harbor, Southwest Pass, Cumberland River, and Ohio River. They must have that money. They had asked for a vastly larger sum than they were going to get; but when they came to the remaining item, which includes the upper Mississippi, they say:

The omission of the remaining items will delay the prosecution of important and worthy improvements, but will not have the serious consequences incident to the omission of the items on which the above statements have been made.

It is difficult to predicate the works that would be omitted were the total amount appropriated $18,000,000 or $15,000,000, respectively.

Mr. JONES of Washington. There is one other statement which the Senator might read:

By omitting those items indicated in your letter on which no comment is made herein, and by the omission of work on some of the smaller items of less importance to general commerce, the expenditures could be brought within the limit of $18,000,000.

Mr. REED. Now, I want to ask Senators representing Mississippi River States what they think they are going to get under these circumstances? Here are engineers who report that they have cut the appropriation absolutely to the bone. They have been required to do it by two separate demands. They have omitted all the items they can omit, and finally they are asked if they can not omit some 21 projects. They report that they can not omit certain of those projects at all, the ones whose names I have just read; they must have that money. As to the rest of them, they can not omit them without serious consequences, but they say they are not as serious as would be the consequences if they abandoned the others.

Now, we have cut them to the bone. We make no provision for emergencies. What chance has the Mississippi River under those circumstances? Just about as much chance as a man who owns a ninth mortgage on a stock of goods that has been seized by the sheriff on a first mortgage, a second mortgage, and a third mortgage, each of them for the total value of the entire stock.

I want Senators to know what they are doing here. They are killing, for the time being, the improvement of every one of these enterprises except the ones that have been specifically mentioned by the engineer, because the engineer now charged with the responsibility of carrying on this work has already said to us, "I need more money for these other enterprises." He has already said, "They are more important," and he has emergencies to look after and extra costs and charges to look after; and it is inevitable—almost as inevitable as fate—that, finding his funds running low, he will neglect these great inland streams.

Let me appeal to the Senator from New York, and then I am through—and, of course, I am greatly trenching upon his time, and I hope not too much on his patience. I have voted for and supported every proposition to improve every New York harbor, not because it was a harbor of New York, but because it was a harbor of the United States; and it is just as important to take care of the hinterland as it is to take care of the frontier of a country. Five or seven million dollars more will keep these projects going at a starvation point, and if we do not get that five or seven million dollars more all of these enterprises are liable to be crippled. Some of them are certain to be temporarily assassinated, if you can have such a thing as temporary assassination. They will be killed for the time being. They can be resuscitated. That is narrow business. It is cheap policy. It is a mistake. There will be wiped out in these rivers works that have been erected for many years, and at great expense, simply because the work has not been carried on, and the work already in has not been protected by further work which is necessary.

It seems to me the Senate at least should set a little example on this matter.

I thank the Senator from New York. I very seldom trespass in this way on a man's time.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the remarks of the able Senators who have interpolated their views into my remarks have illuminated the subject, and, I know, have given the Senate and the country much information.

I have a great deal of sympathy with the position of the Senator from Missouri. He insists that it is a mistaken policy of the Government and of Congress to fail to appropriate sufficient money to properly improve our rivers and harbors, and in consideration of the subject in the committee I had the very things in mind the Senator has spoken of. We ought to keep our rivers and harbors, the water tracks of commerce, open for the business of the Nation.

But the committee had a number of things in mind, Mr. President. It had in mind the condition of the Treasury. The House had sent to us a bill appropriating $12,000,000. We could afford to reasonably increase that sum, but unless we gave up the whole policy laid out by the House, appropriating on a lump-sum basis, we could not afford to too largely increase the amount they appropriated.

There are other reasons, perhaps, that have not occurred to some Senators. This year it will cost for river and harbor improvements at least 120 per cent more than it did four or five years ago; so that this appropriation of $20,000,000 will pay for only about $8,000,000 worth of work five years ago. On first impulse that might prompt Senators to suggest that we ought to appropriate twice as much. I could hardly approve of that position if it were taken, because I think this year we are at the peak of high prices. I feel reasonably certain that after this year we can hope for a steadying of the labor market, we can hope for a steadying of the markets in materials that go into improvements on our rivers and harbors, and while this year we can very properly appropriate a sum not less than $20,000,000, next year I think we can fairly and sensibly go back to our old method of appropriating at least $40,000,000.

It is a fact that the sum of $20,000,000, with the unexpended balances, will, perhaps, carry us to about the first of the year, but not much beyond that. But I do believe—and I will say this in answer to the remarks of the chairman of the committee, giving the figures of unexpended balances each month—that I doubt if it will be possible to get material and labor this summer to do the work laid out. I am engaged in several building operations in New York, and I know that in that city last Monday there was not a bag of cement in the material yards of the city of New York available for delivery for building purposes; and when the awarding of these contracts is actually taken up it will be found, I think, that an appropriation of $20,000,000, together with the unexpended balances, is about what we can fairly expend for this year.

I make this statement as one who is strongly in favor of liberal appropriations for this purpose. I know that the amounts to be awarded for improvements around New York Harbor have been reduced. I have analyzed these sums and the unexpended balances for these improvements, and I am quite convinced that we can carry them on as speedily as they ought to be carried on, in view of the conditions to which I have called attention in the few remarks I have made. But I do think, Mr. President, that in the long run it is a mistake to appropriate money for river and harbor improvements, as we have this year, on the lump-sum basis. It is better to go back to the old method and then have the courage here to refuse to appropriate for rivers and harbors that are unnecessary and where the appropriation of the money is a clear waste, but to appropriate for those where the money is actually needed, whether in the West or in the East or in the North or in the South.

But I wanted to say a word or two about a very necessary improvement in the harbor of New York. Ten years ago Congress authorized an improvement of Jamaica Bay, one of the great bodies of water within the city of New York. At that time the project authorized provided for the dredging of a channel 1,000 feet wide and 18 feet deep. The State of New York and the city of New York were to make certain contributions to the improvement. For various reasons that improvement has been carried on in a very moderate degree, but the demands of the commerce in New York upon our port facilities were so great during the war, and the business has so rapidly increased there, that there has come from that city a great demand for the improvement of this great bay.

Jamaica Bay is situated south of Brooklyn. It is formed by the southerly side of Brooklyn and Rockaway Peninsula and extends along Nassau County on Long Island. It has an area of about 40 square miles. It had a natural channel before this improvement about 10 feet deep. That affords facilities, when properly improved, for taking care of one-third of the commerce of the United States.

In appreciation of the value of the improvement, the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, of the city of New York, during these recent months has provided for the expenditure of $7,500,000 for the building of docks, piers, approaches, and terminals for this improvement, if authorized by Congress. So I have offered an amendment to this bill which provides that this project, authorized in 1910, should be further changed so that we would have a channel about 1,500 feet long, 1,000 feet wide, and 30 feet deep. The Committee on Commerce considered the amendment, and in view of the fact that we have here a lump-sum bill, they refused to approve a change in the project; and we will have to put off this important improvement for another year.

While I have the floor, Mr. President, I want to say just a word or two about the pier and dock and river and harbor improvements in New York. Through that harbor was carried 80 per cent of the war materials that went overseas during the recent World War. Through the harbor also went 60 per cent of the troops who sailed for overseas. I have had occasion to look up the records of the Bureau of Statistics, Department of Commerce, recently, and I find that in the year 1919 the business of New York Harbor, both in the matter of exports and imports, was at least 60 per cent of the total of the country; that in the calendar year 1919, in money value, the exports shipped through the harbor of New York were nearly $1,000,000,000 in excess of the total value of exports of the whole country in any year previous to 1914.

So I think those of us who live in New York can fairly come to Congress and insist that when we do ask for improvements for our harbor we are not presenting to the Congress something for ourselves locally. New York is the metropolis of the Nation. It is a city of which I am sure every Member of this body is justly proud. Of course, those of us who represent the city directly are interested in presenting its claims; but it is the great metropolis of the world to-day, and it seems to me that we can properly ask every consideration for it.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. I agree as to the necessity of those improvements in New York. I was interested in what the Senator said touching the value of the dollar now and the value of the dollar a few years ago. If I understood the Senator correctly, he said that the $20,000,000 appropriated now is equivalent to what about $8,000,000 would have been a few years ago.

Mr. CALDER. Yes; about five years ago, I said.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, if the appropriation of $12,000,000 which the House so generously appropriated for the rivers and harbors of the country should prevail in conference, and should be agreed upon by both the Senate and the House, it would be equivalent to about $5,000,000 five years ago, would it not?

Mr. CALDER. The Senator is correct, in my opinion.

Mr. HARRISON. And the appropriations some five years ago for river and harbor work were around approximately $40,000,000, in some instances going higher than $40,000,000, were they not?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; substantially that, as I remember.

Mr. HARRISON. I noticed in the original estimate of the Board of Army Engineers there were certain projects in New York State, which the Senator is so much interested in, and which I, as one Member of the Senate, would be very glad to vote for, because I realize the necessity of appropriations for the maintenance of those harbors. I notice under New York Harbor, under the estimate of $43,000,000 which was proposed by the engineers, for maintenance and improvement of main entrance channel, $200,000; for continuing improvement of Hudson River channel, $500,000; total for that improvement, $700,000. Reading further:

Channel on Flushing Bay, N. Y., $20,000; East River, N. Y., continuing improvement, $3,200,000.

That is approximately $4,000,000, is it not, for New York State as estimated?

Mr. CALDER. I have not figured it out.

Mr. HARRISON. Under this bill, appropriating $20,000,000, New York State would hardly get over $1,500,000, would they, for these improvements?

Mr. CALDER. I think something like that.

Mr. HARRISON. Then, the only way for these harbors and these improvements to be taken care of properly is for the Senate to act and appropriate sufficient money for it, namely, about $4,000,000, is it not?

Mr. CALDER. I would say to the Senator that the figures indicate that there is an unexpended balance of the amount appropriated for the East River of $4,700,000; for the Hudson River channel, about $684,000; and with the sums which are apparently proposed in the revised bill, it would seem to me this would be enough to carry these improvements through for this calendar year. On the East River we would have quite a balance next year.

Mr. HARRISON. Has it not been the case in every river and harbor bill that there was a balance left over? That is always true, is it not?

Mr. CALDER. Yes. I will say to the Senator, Mr. President, that I have not any quarrel with the position he takes; I have not any disagreement with the Senator. But there are many matters involved in this, and, as I said in my remarks a minute ago, it is a question in my mind this year, with these prices at the peak, with material costing 100 per cent more than last year, or at least 80 per cent more than last year, and with labor costing 50 per cent more than last year, for common labor, the kind we use in that sort of work, whether or not it is advisable this year for Congress to appropriate very large sums for these improvements. I am hopeful, and I see some evidence of it, too, that we are just going over the peak of the high prices.

Mr. HARRISON. The Senator does not know when these prices are coming down?

Mr. CALDER. No.

Mr. HARRISON. As a matter of fact, if we should appropriate this year $40,000,000 it would be a very economical bill, would it not, in view of the fact that when the prices were away down we appropriated larger sums than that?

Mr. CALDER. Yes; $40,000,000 would be equal in practical results to an appropriation of only sixteen or eighteen million dollars five years ago.

Mr. HARRISON. As to these amounts carried over, the amount that would be carried over from the 1st of July this year is no greater than the ordinary carrying over of appropriations year by year, is it?

Mr. CALDER. No.

Mr. HARRISON. About the same?

Mr. CALDER. I am not sure about that. I presume so.

Mr. HARRISON. My information is that it is about the same.

Mr. CALDER. I think it can fairly be said that we are spending the money faster now because things cost so much more. A project that would ordinarily cost a hundred thousand will cost two hundred thousand, perhaps two hundred and fifty thousand with the utmost economy, and we are spending money faster now.

Mr. HARRISON. That is why it seems most strange to some of us, who recognize the great importance of river and harbor improvement, for the Senate to cut down the appropriation from $43,000,000 to $20,000,000, when they admit that the dollar will go only about 40 per cent as far as the dollar went five years ago.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, the only answer that can be made to that statement is that just now the Congress might very properly set an example of economy, although I doubt the wisdom of it in these improvements.

Mr. REED. Just now the Senator said "set an example of economy." All along the line or just on rivers? Are we setting any example of economy when we increase the standing Army of the United States three and one-half times what it has ever been under a peace establishment and when we quadruple the personnel of the Navy? We are doing that on the peak prices, and we are doing it at a time when the country is in greater safety than it has been in in the last 50 years. There is not any country in the world that can fight us now. All of them have to come here to get money to live on.

Mr. HARRISON. May I suggest that the same argument that is put forward now by the Senator from New York has been used for the last four years when the river and harbor bill has come before the Senate? We have appropriated lump sums for the last few years, every one of which was inadequate, and there is not a harbor in the United States that has not suffered by reason of the inadequacy of appropriations for improvements.

Mr. CALDER. We did not appropriate a lump sum last year, I will say to the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. HARRISON. What was the amount appropriated last year?

Mr. CALDER. I am not sure as to the amount, but it was not a lump-sum appropriation, I know.

Mr. HARRISON. I have forgotten just the amount, but it was a very small sum and many projects were left out and the appropriations were cut down very much. My recollection is that for the last few years there have been lump-sum appropriations.

Mr. CALDER. No; I know that last year it was not a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. HARRISON. What was the amount, may I ask?

Mr. CALDER. My impression is that it was about $25,000,000.

Mr. SPENCER. May I say to the Senator from Mississippi that the actual amount expended is given on page 3 of the report, but the amount of the appropriation, which is made up of many items, is not given. The amount expended is $21,245,177.

Mr. CALDER. I thank the Senator for this information.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I want to say that I agree with what the Senator says with reference to the improvement of the harbor in New York, and I have in times past supported liberal appropriations for that harbor. My recollection is that when the East River channel was really put on as an exception to the rule or policy that was being followed in framing the bill at that time, I supported the appropriation for the East River Channel because of the importance of the commerce of New York to the commerce of the country.

Mr. CALDER. I know the Senator has always followed that course.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I regret that it was not possible under the situation to put on a provision with reference to Jamaica Bay, to which the Senator has referred. The Senator has stated the circumstances controlling that, and he recognizes the situation as well as anybody.

But what I did want to refer to was this: I have had some representatives from New York call attention to the magnificent character of the piers which they have constructed there, and, while I know nothing about it personally, I was impressed with an editorial that I saw in the Scientific American just a short time ago, wherein they criticized very severely the piers of New York City.

I have not the editorial here; I do not think I would put it in the RECORD if I did have it; but I did call it to the attention of the Senator from New York. That criticizes the piers very severely, and if the Senator would like to give us some information with reference to that I would be very glad to have it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. CALDER. I want to answer the question of the Senator from Washington, if the Senator from Missouri will permit me.

Mr. REED. Certainly.

Mr. CALDER. I assume that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] refers to an editorial in the Scientific American of last month. I believe he showed it to me himself. It spoke of some piers being erected on Staten Island, which is within New York City—10 big piers being erected at a cost of something like $6,000,000. The article criticized those piers severely.

I doubted the statements in the editorial and submitted it to the city authorities, and I have a letter from the dock commissioner of the city which goes into the whole matter of those piers. Without reading the letter, Mr. President, I ask permission to incorporate it in the RECORD. It is a full statement of the whole pier system of New York, and I am sure it will be interesting for the Senator from Washington to read, as chairman of the committee, and also other Senators who may wish to inquire about our docks in New York City.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MCNARY in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The letter referred to is as follows:

APRIL 5, 1920.

Hon. JOHN F. HYLAN,
Mayor of New York City,
City Hall, New York.

MY DEAR JUDGE: From time to time there have appeared in the public press and various magazines criticisms of the piers being constructed at Stapleton, Staten Island. I have been so busy that time has not permitted me to prepare and issue specific denials.

But, under date of March 24, 1920, I received a letter from Senator CALDER, in which he says:

> Senator JONES has called my attention to an article in the Scientific American, on page 96, of the March 20 issue, in criticism of your Staten Island piers. From your talk with me, it was an entirely different description than the one given in this article. If this is a misrepresentation, you ought to communicate with these people and have them retract it. I wish you would write me what you have done in the matter. An article of this kind appearing in such a publication has a bad effect upon the people here in Washington. We claim to be able to take care of these matters in New York, but according to this editorial when we build piers they are entirely unfit for the purpose for which they are constructed.

Upon receipt of this communication from Senator CALDER I immediately communicated with the Scientific American and requested them to have an engineer go over the plans and specifications of these piers, which up to the present time they have not done.

The article referred to is entitled "Archaic plans for New York City piers," and is so full of misstatements that I have determined to present a fair statement of the facts as they really exist, not so much with a desire to defend any action which the city administration has taken, after months of consultation with steamship interests and deliberation, but in a sense of fairness, so that those in authority in Washington, not being familiar with the conditions as they exist at the port of New York, may not be unduly prejudiced by an article of the character appearing in so reputable a paper as the Scientific American.

It is stated that the new Stapleton piers "will be hampered by the same lack of spaciousness which handicaps the majority of the existing piers in this city."

As an answer to this, let me state, in brief, the layout of the Stapleton piers:

Twelve piers are being laid down, ranging in length from 1,000 feet to 1,160 feet. Eight of these piers will be 125 feet wide with single-story steel freight sheds thereon; two piers will be 130 feet wide with double-decked steel freight sheds thereon; and two of these piers will be 209 feet wide with double-decked steel freight sheds thereon. At present there are in the city of New York approximately 400 commercial piers; that is to say, piers that are given over to the commerce of the port. Of these 400 piers, only 14 are of greater width than the piers of minimum width being constructed at Staten Island and only 1 is wider than the 2 piers of maximum width being constructed at Stapleton. In only one case in the whole port of New York is there any pier with a slip wider than the 300-foot slips adopted as the standard slip at Stapleton. There are 30 piers in the port of New York 125 feet in width or more, and of these 30 piers the average range of pier and slip together is only 396 feet, while the piers at Stapleton, with the half slips apportioned to them, will have a minimum range of pier and slip width of 425 feet and a maximum of 509 feet. This should prove conclusively that the same lack of spaciousness will not exist in the Stapleton development.

The piers erected by Gen. Goethals at the Army base are but 150 feet wide, and the intervening slips are only 250 feet. The 125-foot piers at Stapleton can be widened at any time to 175 feet by adding 25 feet on each side, and this will only reduce the slips to the same width as the recently constructed Army base piers.

The Scientific American article also states:

No provision is made for running freight cars either alongside the ships or into the sheds.

Ten of the piers have provision for a double-track railroad with two crossovers each through the center of the piers, and on two of the piers a double-track railroad with two crossovers on the pier will be installed on each side of the pier.

The article further states:

The proposed docks are not provided with the modern, labor-saving, freight-handling equipment which is to be found in the modern piers at rival ports such as Philadelphia, Montreal, and Halifax, and at the leading European ports like Liverpool, London, etc.

It must be stated that the city of New York, as far as its port is concerned, is sui generis. An inspection of the map will readily show that the port of New York is a series of isolated islands, with navigable streams of more than the average width separating them and the State of New Jersey. All of the main-line railroads, with the exception of two, have their terminals on the west bank of the Hudson, and in the absence of a comprehensive connecting belt-line railroad the lighterage system as developed by physical conditions constitutes the substitute. These same conditions do not exist at the ports enumerated by the Scientific American, and as all of the proposed Staten Island piers were leased for the accommodation of vessels operating to and from the ports mentioned in the Scientific American's article, it is probably assumed that the practical steamship people, in indicating their requirements, were fully cognizant of the conditions of handling freight existing at the ports mentioned, as well as other ports of the world, and chose the type of structure for their particular character of business as demanded by the conditions existing in the port of New York.

To this end, eight lessees, including the International Mercantile Marine Co. and the French Line, have chosen a 1-story shed structure on a pier 125 feet wide; two have chosen 2-story shed structures on piers 130 feet wide; and two have chosen 2-story shed structures on a pier 209 feet wide, with double-track railroad on either side and gantry cranes, besides the two truck elevators on each of the latter two piers, with a capacity of 20 tons each, together with the necessary truck scales and railroad scales. In other words, the two larger type piers at Staten Island will, in every sense, be far superior to anything that exists at any port in the world, and this department would have recommended gladly the construction of all the piers on the same general plan if it had been possible to lease them, but as the piers are being "built to order" to suit the requirements of the respective tenants we have been limited by the expression of their choice as to their individual needs.

It might, however, be well to call attention to the fact that taking the 1-story shed piers, 125 feet wide, as type No. 1 at 100 per cent, the 2-story shed on the 130-foot pier will cost relatively 152 per cent, and the 2-story shed on the 209-foot pier will cost relatively 210 per cent. Moreover, the 12 piers at Stapleton, combining, as they do, three distinct types of structures and all operated under similar conditions, will settle forever the type of structure that will be found to be most economically advantageous for the business of the port of New York, at least where there is rail-head connection. All of these piers will be equipped with such tractors, trailers, and ship cargo devices as may be deemed necessary for the conduct of their business by the respective lessees themselves.

The Scientific American article also states that "the other ports have displayed intelligence, vision, and foresight in providing means of access for motor vehicles as well as for the sorting and storing of the cargoes of modern steamers."

To the ordinary reader this would indicate that motor vehicles could not drive on those piers. This is so obviously false that the only answer to be given is that motor vehicles can and will drive on these piers, and in this respect it may be stated that the Stapleton piers will add 26,000 lineal feet of side wharfage and a floor area of 2,250,000 square feet of deck space.

At a conference recently held at the office of the dock commissioner representatives of all the railroads entering the port of New York were present, and a plan is now being formulated in connection with these railroad experts to devise and lay out an intelligent, coordinate system of track facilities, so that there can be no doubt that with tracks on all of the 12 piers and with an intelligent system of feed lines behind the piers the criticism of the Scientific American about railroad facilities is absolutely a misstatement of facts and would indicate that the writer of the article had not only never seen the plans but had not taken the trouble to inform himself of the facts, relying on the continued misstatements that have appeared in the public press as a part of what I believe to have been a misguided propaganda conducted by private interests for selfish purposes.

The Scientific American article also states that "the typical New York pier is a long and relatively narrow structure," and so forth, and calls attention to the fact that the marginal street outside the piers in the typical New York pier is crowded with teams, sometimes three and four deep, and so forth.

The writer of that article has apparently confused or rather taken as his standard the congested conditions existing on the lower North River, Manhattan, water front. This condition has been recognized by the present commissioner of docks, and on March 18, 1920, after many months of careful consideration of the subject, presented to the commissioners of the sinking fund of the city of New York, the duly authorized authority to pass on such matters, a new plan, which when completed will modernize the lower North River water front, and which, in the opinion of the writer, is the particular portion of the water front selected by all of the critics of the port of New York to condemn the entire port as a whole. In this proposed modernization it is intended to remove 32 existing piers, laid out and constructed substantially on a plan portraying conditions of 50 years ago, and build in place of these piers 18 new piers, 7 of which will be 150 feet wide, 9 of which will be 125 feet wide, and 2 of which will be 100 feet wide.

This improvement when completed will add more than 50 per cent to the available deck surface on the piers, which 50 per cent is equivalent to more than 70 per cent of the marginal street area adjacent to them. The commissioner of docks has realized that a proper selection of pier width, slip width, and street area is the proper solution of the "archaic" conditions existing on the lower North River water front, and if the energies of the Scientific American could be devoted to promoting this improvement, it would really be acting in a constructive way for the great good not alone of the city's and State's but of the Nation's commerce.

The Scientific American article also states that the Staten Island development has met with the "practically universal condemnation of the engineers, the shipping experts, and the technical press of the city."

I deny this.

It has met with the condemnation of an organization known as the Society of Terminal Engineers, who, at a meeting attended by a very small number of its members, passed a resolution to that effect. At the same time, one of the engineers most active in that organization was supervising the construction of a pier adjoining the Staten Island development, by no means more modern than the piers at Stapleton, projected by the city. But among the shipping experts must be classified the lessees of the Stapleton piers themselves; and again, at a meeting held October 8, 1919, the committee on harbor, docks, and terminals of the Merchants' Association of New York City adopted the following resolution:

This committee has intimate knowledge through long experience of the methods now in use for handling cargoes upon the piers in this city and the reasons for and utility of such methods. The cargoes reaching the city are extremely divers in character. The packages vary widely in size and weight and are usually not adapted, therefore, to mechanical handling, which is suitable principally to packages of standard size or to cargoes of a uniform character. Most of the cargoes reaching New York are not suitable for direct rail reshipment, but must be warehoused, rehandled, and reassembled prior to reshipment. Few of the steamship companies find that lines of rails upon their piers present any advantage either in the cost or convenience of handling, but that, on the contrary, such rails are usually a direct obstruction.

The committee, therefore, does not concur in the proposition that in the construction of new piers they should be of such type as to provide either for rails or for mechanical handling, for the reason that if such general policy were adopted it would require piers of heavier structure than at present, involve a material increase in the costs, and substantially interfere with tidal currents. It is the opinion of the committee that the city should, however, in advance of the construction of piers, make leases therefor whenever possible and should thereafter construct piers of such nature and fitted with such mechanical appliances for handling as may be desired by the lessees.

The Scientific American article further states that "the officials of the dock department have deliberately flouted the judgment of the men who have made a study of port facilities."

This is not borne out by fact. Public hearings were held in the office of the dock commissioner before and after the plans were drawn and no suggestion was ever made by the Society of Terminal Engineers. At these meetings were represented the steamship interests and agents of concerns selling mechanical equipment.

The writer offered to lease to the Material Handling Machinery Manufacturers' Association a pier, to be constructed in accordance with the advice of their own engineers, equipped with every modern, labor-saving, freight-handling device, which pier they might let out on daily wharfage for the purpose of demonstrating their facilities to the whole world, but they declined, and urged that the city ought to do the experimenting with its own money, irrespective of the wishes and desires of the tenants who had applied for and subsequently leased these piers on a basis of 7½ per cent of the cost of acquiring the land and constructing the improvement.

The article calls attention to the fine, modern docks in France that so greatly facilitated the rushing of supplies to our Army; but were not 90 per cent of these supplies shipped and did not our valiant soldiers sail from these same "archaic" piers in the port of New York? And while the piers in France were given over entirely for military purposes, let me add that the piers in New York accommodated our normal commercial activities in addition to meeting the war-time demand.

In the sense of fairness, and in accordance with the expressed policy of the Scientific American "to record accurately and lucidly the latest scientific news of the day," I am still hopeful that the management of the Scientific American will avail themselves of my invitation to go over the plans of the Stapleton development and to hear from those in authority the reasons for each and every step that has been taken, so that from a sense of local pride the Scientific American, a New York publication founded 75 years ago, can and will publish an article representing the facts as they exist, so that no prejudice to the interests of the great port of New York at a time when all should combine to keep the supremacy preeminent may be suffered from the publication of such a misleading article as appeared in the issue of March 20, 1920.

Yours, very truly,

MURRAY HULBERT,
Commissioner of Docks.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, in connection with the building of docks in New York City, I wish to say that the city of New York has expended, out of its own treasury, over $350,000,000 to improve the dock facilities of the city. The city of New York owns practically all the water front; it owns all the water front on the Island of Manhattan and most of the water front in Brooklyn and the Queens, and to-day in the city of New York, except Jamaica Bay, there is not a particle of city-owned property available for the improvement of our docks, and thereby the extension of our commerce, excepting only that part of our park system which fronts on the rivers and the bay.

I know of nothing more important for the great metropolis of the Nation to-day than the improvement of this very same Jamaica Bay proposition to which I have referred. In the next river and harbor bill I shall submit an amendment to incorporate this project, unless it is provided in the House before the bill comes to the Senate. I know that if I offered it here at this time, in view of the attitude of the other members of the Committee on Commerce, it would fail of consideration, but next year I shall offer it.

I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a letter from the governor of New York in connection with the improvement of Jamaica Bay.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there is no objection, permission is granted.

The letter is as follows:

STATE OF NEW YORK,
EXECUTIVE CHAMBER,
Albany, April 7, 1920.

Hon. WILLIAM M. CALDER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: In connection with the passage of the act of Congress approved June 24, 1910, and to the end that the city of New York might cooperate with the Federal Government in the creation of a new harbor in and about Jamaica Bay, including the making of channels, basins, slips, and other necessary adjuncts intended for the advancement of the commercial interests of the city, State, and Nation, the State of New York has, by chapter 568 of the Laws of 1909, granted to the city of New York such right, title, and interest as the State of New York had in and to the land under water in Jamaica Bay and Rockaway Inlet.

It is apparent that to create a harbor in Jamaica Bay for the accommodation of ocean-going vessels, there must be a greater depth than 18 feet. That this was contemplated is manifest by reference to the report of Col. Knight, who submitted estimates for the construction and maintenance of a 30-foot channel, with the suggestion that a channel only 18 feet deep be provided and extended to 30 feet when commercial necessity required.

With the improvements which the city of New York now has under way, practically all of the water front, except Park property, accessible to deep-draft vessels, has been or is being utilized, and it is quite natural that the city of New York—until a sufficient channel has been provided through Hell Gate—should turn toward the improvement of Jamaica Bay.

I most earnestly urge you to use every effort possible to secure authorization in the pending river and harbor bill to make the unexpended balance available toward a 30-foot channel through Rockaway Inlet up to Mill Basin, in order that the lands granted by the State, without compensation, may be utilized for the purposes intended.

Yours, very truly, ALFRED E. SMITH.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator from New York permit me, in order to clear up a little confusion about the record, to say that I have before me the river and harbor bill of last year. The Senator is correct in his statement that the appropriation was not a lump sum, but was an appropriation for specific items. But I call attention to the fact that that bill, which was passed on March 2, 1919, when we were just emerging from the war, carried $33,378,664. The bill that we passed in the very midst of the war, when the war was at its height, in the month of July, 1918, when we did not know yet what the result would be, except as every American citizen knew in his American heart that of course we were going to win—that is the way he felt and consequently that is the way he believed—appropriated $23,771,900.

By the way, the argument on both those bills was that prices were very high, but they were going to go down right soon, and also the argument on the bill which was passed in July, 1918, when we were in the midst of the Great War and straining every resource and using every man that we could and all the materials we could for the war.

The war is past. Two years have gone by since we cut to the bone in the midst of the war, and it is now proposed to go to a still lower point, to appropriate a little over one-half of the money we did six months after the war was over, and we are still talking about high prices. Does not the Senator think that it is a niggardly and mistaken policy—I will cut out the word "niggardly." Is it not a mistaken policy?

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I voted in the Committee on Commerce to increase the appropriation for this purpose from $12,000,000 to $20,000,000, because I believed the appropriation of $12,000,000 was a mistaken policy. Perhaps the Senator is right; possibly we might have given a little bit more; but it seemed to me and to others that in voting a 50 per cent increase in the House appropriation we were doing about all we could hope to bring about at this session of Congress.

Mr. REED. That is to say, we were not voting what we thought we ought to do, but because the House started at a ridiculous sum, based on no estimate of an engineer living or dead, that we were to fail in doing our duty here.

Mr. CALDER. Oh, no; not at all. I merely seek to show that the appropriation thought proper by the committee was considerably greater than provided in the House bill.

Mr. REED. Is it not about time that the Senate should quit trailing the House absolutely?

Mr. CALDER. When we increase an appropriation 50 per cent we are not trailing the House. It is a decided increase over the House estimate.

Mr. REED. Suppose the House estimated nothing?

Mr. CALDER. I never would have agreed to that.

Mr. REED. An increase of 50 per cent there would not have amounted to much. They just the same as appropriated nothing.

Mr. CALDER. Oh, no; I do not think that.

Mr. REED. Twelve million dollars is the equivalent of nothing on these harbors.

Mr. President, I want to say just a word, and then I will yield the floor. We hear about high prices and stopping public improvements of this character because of high prices. The Senator knows that the congestion in New York harbor during the war cost this country probably ten times the entire amount it would have cost to have made these improvements that are asked. I think the Senator certainly will agree with me in that statement.

Mr. CALDER. There is no doubt about it. If we had our rivers and harbors properly improved, we could have saved half a billion dollars.

Mr. REED. Yes; you could have saved half a billion dollars and nobody knows how much more.

Mr. Garfield stopped the manufacturing in this country in every mill east of the Ohio River for 14 days, and turned out of employment for that 14 days many millions of men and women, with a complete economic loss of their time. He closed the churches on Sunday and the moving pictures on Monday. The economic loss to the country from that one closing period has been estimated by reliable economists as running into the billions of dollars; and his sole charge was because the railroads were unable to handle the freight and that that congestion began at New York Harbor, and the congestion at New York Harbor is partially, at least, accounted for by the inadequacy of the harbor, which Congress ought to have removed long ago. It tells the story of this kind of economy.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE] knows that a few years ago his State suffered by flood, and that the economic losses of a single one of those floods would have harnessed those streams and taken care of them for the future. But a cheesparing and contemptible policy of saving a few cents had been pursued and projects had been half completed and the floods came and the waters fell and the country suffered.

Now, just one further thought in regard to high prices. I have been waiting for the effects of high prices for a good long time. I have seen every kind of experiment tried known to modern human ingenuity, but there is not any one of them that has not been tried off and on in the world's history for 2,000 years, and there has never been one of them proven anything but a disastrous mistake in all that long stretch of the centuries. We have tried to do it by law. When you pass a law that no man shall sell a horse for more than $150 you increase the price of every horse in the country, because everybody knows that horses are scarce and everybody who has one holds on to it.

I do not intend to follow that argument. I simply throw out the suggestion. The last experiment we had is for the Department of Justice to be chasing around the country making speeches to societies of ladies of all degrees of age, telling them to buy cheap things when there are no cheap things to buy; telling them how they can wear calico dresses and the men how they can wear overalls; and the sole result has been to put up the price of calico and overalls. It is not only foolish, but it is idiotic. It is a performance that is worthy of the best effort of the most finely organized lunatic asylum ever located upon this earth. It has just as much effect in reducing prices as a rain prayer meeting such as they used to have in drought times out in Kansas had on the weather.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Missouri think that it really has a worse effect? As he suggested a while ago, the people who are buying and wearing overalls, and who really do not have to do so, are simply increasing the price of the overalls for men who have to have them to work in.

Mr. REED. The Senator did not quite get my sentence. I said that so far as reducing the prices was concerned it had that effect.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I agree with the Senator absolutely.

Mr. REED. By disturbing economic conditions you can put up prices, but I have never known of an instance whereby by disturbing economic conditions you could succeed in putting down prices.

We have every kind of foolish movement going on. We propose to regulate rents. Now, what is the trouble with the rent problem? The real trouble with the rent problem is that for about five years we almost entirely quit building houses in this country; but babies continued to be born, boys and girls continued to get married, new homes were necessary, and in a little while all the empty houses were taken up. Formerly there had always been a few more houses than there were tenants; the owners of houses were bidding against each other for tenants, and that kept rents down. Then we came to a period when population increased, but houses no longer increased. When all the houses were filled, the landlords said, "I can sell the occupancy of my house each month for more money"; and when he raised the rent the tenant had to pay because he had no other house to which to go.

What is the remedy? More houses. How are you going to get more houses? Is anybody, except a picturesque variety of idiot of some kind, going to build a house when he knows that some fellow who never owned a house in his life is going to fix the rent on that house after he has built it? Of course, he will not do so. The only houses that are being built are being put up by those men who are bold enough to feel that they can escape these conditions.

If, however, you will let things alone and rents become profitable, in a very short time the people will rush into the house-building business and you will have a surplus of houses. The minute you have got 5 per cent of surplusage of houses in the community, rents go down; when the landlord proposes to raise the rent, the tenant moves; and when the landlord will not reasonably reduce the rent the tenant moves. The man who has a vacant house wants to rent it, he bids for tenants.

The trouble with high prices—and I have wandered a little from what I wanted to say—is the gap between production and consumption. That was made by withdrawing 25,000,000 men from the constructive and productive vocations of the world and putting them on the field of war. You have got to fill that gap; and until you do fill that gap, labor will be very high, rents will be very high, provisions will be very high. The minute you have created more than the people need, all these things will drop and you will get down to a different level. How long is that going to take? Are we going to delay the public business of the country until that occurs? Who will say when it will occur? Why, sir, a moment's consideration will convince any sensible man that it will not occur for a long time, unless there comes some great world financial or industrial catastrophe that destroys business and we go through a panic and get down to a sort of starvation basis. We all hope to escape that.

Proceeding along natural lines, what must we confront; what do we confront?

First, the enormous shortage in the world of the commodities that are necessary; second, an inflation of money in the world which in itself has reduced the purchasing power of the dollar from 50 cents in this country to a much larger percentage in other countries. In the days of William J. Bryan, when he proposed the free and unlimited coinage of silver, we had $17.50 per capita circulating in this country. It was said that if there was free coinage of silver there would be from thirty to thirty-five dollars per capita; that that would make a 50-cent dollar; and that that was repudiation and dishonesty. I have not seen the figures for six weeks, but six weeks ago we had in circulation in this country $55.60 per capita. It is no wonder that the purchasing power of the dollar has decreased.

If you go to other countries, you will find a much more startling condition. In France every dollar of specie has long since gone into hiding, and they have a paper circulation of over $125 per capita. In England, where an 80 per cent and frequently a 100 per cent gold reserve used to be kept back of English bank notes, and generally back of English currency, that reserve dropped until a short while back it did not exceed 20 per cent, which means not a decrease in the amount of gold and silver they possess, but an increase of the amount of paper they have out. England has complained bitterly of the exchange rate between this country and herself, but the exchange rates exactly follow the difference in the actual values of the money. The same difference exists between the value of the English pound sterling and the value of French money, and of German money, and of Russian money, and Italian money, that is found to exist between the American dollar and the British pound sterling; that is, I do not mean the same in amount, but there is a corresponding and similar difference between the further depreciated money of other countries and the money of England, which is next to ours in soundness.

Now, with the money of the world in that condition, it must necessarily follow that apparent prices will be high until that money can be gradually drawn in, and for this inflated currency there shall be substituted a stable and a sound money in the countries of the world. How many years will it take? How long will it take? For my part, I do not propose to give my consent that the business of the United States shall stand still because we have to pay a particular price to-day when no man can guarantee that price will not go higher to-morrow. We might as well face these conditions as they are. The truth of the matter is, the world has moved up to a higher standard of prices. It is my opinion that we will stay at that standard. Perhaps we will go back to some extent, but never to the old values; and the man who looks for a $1-a-bushel wheat in the future is looking for something that in my judgment is not going to happen; the man who expects to hire an individual to work with a pick and a shovel on a railroad for 80 or 90 cents a day is looking for something that he will never see again in this country; and, in part, this is not altogether lacking in the quality of blessing.

The difficulty is that during the period of readjustment certain of the people get "pinched" because they have not been able to readjust themselves to meet conditions.

Now, I beg Senators that they will not throttle public improvements because dollars are cheap to-day. The same policy would lead to no improvement in anything in the country, and that would mean stagnation; it would mean a further gap between production and consumption; and it would mean in the end further hardships for what we ordinarily call, for want of a better name, the common people; that is, the people who have to depend upon their wages and their salaries and their very small incomes for sustenance.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I ask what amendment is now pending?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Connecticut that the pending amendment is that of the committee on line 4, page 5, the item relating to the Northwest River.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] desires the amendment acted upon to-night.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I was going to suggest that I know the Senator from Virginia is anxious to get away, and I think the Senator from Ohio is also anxious to leave. While I do not wish to encourage their going away, I suggest, as this amendment has come back for reconsideration, that we dispose of it, and then debate can proceed on the question as to the amount to be appropriated by this bill. I merely make that suggestion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the adoption of the committee amendment at the top of page 5, line 4, providing for a survey of Northwest River, Va. [Putting the question.] By the sound the "ayes" seem to have it.

Mr. POMERENE. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, a few days ago I offered an amendment on page 9 of the bill. Col. Taylor, of the Engineer Department, has suggested to me that the amendment be framed in different language. I have submitted the reformed language to the Senator from Washington, the chairman of the committee, and he does not object to it; and I should like to ask that the action of the Senate on that amendment be reconsidered. It is found at the end of line 4, page 9. The amendment reads:

Trent River, from New Bern to Trenton, N. C.: With a view to a channel depth of 12 feet to Pollocksville and 8 feet to Trenton.

I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the action of the Senate on that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMMONS. I now offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator what change it makes?

Mr. SIMMONS. It just connects the Neuse River with the Trent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. In lieu of the amendment offered and adopted regarding the Trent River, N. C., it is proposed to insert the following:

Neuse and Trent Rivers, N. C.: With a view to securing a channel depth of 12 feet in Neuse River up to New Bern; thence a depth of 12 feet in Trent River up to Pollocksville and 8 feet up to Trenton.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SPENCER. Mr. President, the pending bill has to do, according to its terms, with the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works and the prosecution of such projects heretofore authorized as may be desirable in the interests of commerce and navigation. This has to do with the entire inland river and harbor waterway situation of the country. I understand that my colleague, the distinguished senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], has introduced an amendment by which the amount of $20,000,000, which the committee has recommended, is increased to $27,000,000. May I ask the Chair whether that amount is correct, as to whether the pending amendment does increase the committee amendment from $20,000,000 to $27,000,000?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the pending question.

Mr. SPENCER. I support that amendment increasing the appropriation from $20,000,000 to $27,000,000.

The question of transportation is not a mere abstract proposition in this country for some rate expert to consider and to solve. It is a vital, pressing, essential part of our national welfare.

Mr. Walter S. Dickey, of Missouri, a man many of the years of whose life have been given to the subject of the waterways, said not long ago in a paper which he prepared at the request of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, "that 'moving things,' 'freighting,' next to subsistence itself, is the world's greatest enterprise," and when we have to do with the subject of transportation in these United States we are dealing with one of the fundamental elements of national welfare.

The disparity between the appropriations that we make—eight or nine hundred million dollars for the Army, between four and five hundred million dollars for the Navy, $105,000,000 for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government, $462,000,000 for the post offices, $214,000,000 for pensions—I do not say that any one of those is unnecessary, but I do say that the disparity between those amounts and $32,000,000 for agriculture and $20,000,000 for the inland waterways and harbors of these United States is ridiculous.

We are dependent upon the harbors and the waterways of this Nation. If we neglect their improvement, it is not an evidence of economy; it is an illustration of gross and unreasonable extravagance. We make a plan that will take care of a great inland waterway. We made such a plan in 1910, when, after a careful engineering examination of the projects of the Missouri and the Mississippi, Congress determined that they would expend $20,000,000 upon the Missouri River from Kansas City to the Mississippi, and that they would expend it at the rate of $2,000,000 a year, and that they would secure a permanent 6-foot channel from Kansas City to the Mississippi. That project had back of it the judgment and the skill of the Engineering Department of the Government. It was feasible. It would have accomplished its plan. Upon the strength of it residents of Kansas City invested a million dollars in steel barges and ran them upon the Missouri River and down the Mississippi; and for six months of every year during the nine years of their operation the barges were a success, except when the channel choked and sand bars formed, and the failure of the Government to do its part made inland water navigation upon that great river impossible, for instead of expending $2,000,000 a year, as Congress agreed that they would do, the expenditures of the years from 1910 to 1920 have aggregated only $8,000,000, and have been thrown in here and thrown in there, so that the resultant of all the appropriations has not been a deepened and established channel but only temporary improvement now and then, which, with the spring freshets and the change of channel, are largely lost year by year.

That is not economy—this is extravagance, and when we come to deal in this bill with the problem of transportation, I am pleading for an economical determination of the problem—that we spend enough money to insure that what we spend it for shall be completed and made permanent.

The commercial, industrial, and agricultural stability of our country directly depends upon transportation.

We are no stronger as a Nation than is our ability to provide and operate and coordinate the carriage of people and material.

Of what use are the great harvests of grain in the West and Middle West or the cotton crop of the South or the coal and mineral and oil of the country or the products of manufacturing industries without the ability to carry them to the places where they are needed?

They are, without the facilities of bringing them to market and to consumer, mere local dumps of commodities that have comparatively no value.

The factor that makes a nation strong in peace as well as in war is the ability to transport the things or the men that are needed to the place where the necessity for them exists.

This fundamental truth—too often neglected—lies at the very foundation of national prosperity.

It is the reason why 1 out of every 10 of our population is directly dependent for their living upon the wage or the salary incident to transportation agencies.

It is the question that affects the comfort and usefulness of every individual and regulates the quantity and quality and price of practically everything the individual eats or wears or uses.

What may be called primary transportation is not merely a question of local concern—it is a matter of national interest.

We are concerned as a people with the road from every farm to the highway, and from every separate mine and manufacturing plant to the highway or waterway, and from every home to the place of business or to the mart of trade.

It is a slogan worth repeating: "A hard road from every farm to the highway, and a broad highway to every city and town."

The direct loss from inadequate and inefficient primary transportation facilities is enough in itself to carry and eventually to pay the national debt. It is beyond computation in dollars and cents.

If every man had accessible transportation between home and place of business and place of trade; if every farmer could reach the highway, irrespective of weather, on roads capable of at all times carrying loads, and on these highways reach town or city, railroad or waterway, at any time of the year and any state of the weather, it would at once add 25 per cent to the wealth of the Nation.

When we pass from primary transportation to what may be called through transportation, and that includes both intrastate and interstate transportation, we have precisely the same general proposition, and that is the necessity of adequate economical carrying facilities of everything that is produced on farm or at the mine or in the factory from the place of production to the place of consumption, with the auxiliary problems of distribution.

In all of these questions the two main requirements are adequacy of facilities and reasonableness of cost, and the two great methods of such transportation are railway and waterway.

Railroads and waterways can not and must not be antagonistic; both are indispensable. The former are public utilities privately owned, but in the very nature of the case must be governmentally controlled. The latter are both governmentally owned and controlled, and the relation between these two great methods of transportation must be one of harmony, coordination, and cooperation.

This will be entirely voluntary if men are wise and recognize that in the last analysis the welfare of the people is the dominant factor to be considered in all transportation.

But if such cooperation and coordination is not voluntary, it will be compulsory by the people's mandate, for the people can be relied upon to see to it that the two mighty agencies of carriage—the one of which they own, i. e., waterways, and the other of which they control, i. e., the railroads—shall not unfairly compete against each other to the ultimate loss of the consumer.

Railroads, of course, run where man puts them. Waterways are in fixed valleys. The feeders of the permanent waterway routes are the man-built railroads. Every long haul that can be arranged by water is at approximately one-third the cost of the equivalent haul by rail, and, so far as such waterway transportation is available, every reason of economy suggests its use.

It is axiomatic to say that the railroads themselves can not carry the tonnage of the country. Again and again their inability has been demonstrated.

There are those here who vividly remember in the fall of 1906 and 1907 when grain lay for weeks in the open fields and at or near railroad stations in Missouri, Kansas, Arkansas, and Nebraska, waiting in vain for cars for transportation, and with a loss to the Nation difficult to compute.

This same situation is not unfamiliar, quite apart from any war emergency, in every section of our country.

E. H. Harriman, once speaking for a transcontinental line, gave it as his opinion that it would be worth the many billions it would cost to practically double the standard gauge of the railroad, so that the carrying capacity of the roads might be correspondingly increased, because the ability of the railroads of the country with their present gauge had about reached their maximum efficiency, and the products of mills and mines and farms can not be transported with any degree of promptness and efficiency. This means both immediate loss and decreased production, for neither mill nor mine nor farm will expand its products if uncertain of access to the markets when and where they are needed.

James J. Hill expressed substantially the same opinion, as follows:

> With traffic increasing at the rate of nearly 12 per cent per annum, the situation has become intolerable. The process—

Referring to the carrying capacity of the railroads—> has reached a practical limit. Merely to accommodate existing traffic I assume that we would need to build 75,000 miles of new track, costing, with terminals, $5,500,000,000. A 15-foot canal or channel from St. Louis to New Orleans would go further to relieve the entire Middle West or Southwest than any other work that could be undertaken. With such a depth of water a single powerful towboat equipped with barges would carry from 30 to 40 trainloads.

If the railroad facilities are inadequate now, as we know they are, how increasingly great will that inadequacy multiply in the years of expanding trade and production that are immediately before us?

Increase as you may railroads, hard-surface roads, trolley lines, aerial traffic, you still have an immense quantity of material wealth to be transported, which loses its value in proportion as transportation is inadequate, and which is already far in excess of every land or air method of carriage in existence.

This brings us to the very subject we are met to consider.

Waterways are the natural method of transportation. They were in use before railroads were dreamed of. They are capable of development almost without limit.

They possess the advantage of gravity on the down trip.

Take the map of the United States and note the great waterway connections of the middle country: (a) St. Paul to New Orleans by way of the Mississippi; (b) Kansas City to the Gulf by way of the Missouri and the Mississippi; (c) Pittsburgh to the Gulf by way of the Ohio and the Mississippi; (d) Chicago to the Gulf through canal and the Illinois River.

These are illustrations of the possibility of the great Mississippi Valley, that valley which comprises approximately 2,000,000 square miles of fertile territory and which has been aptly described as "the greatest habitable estate in the world." It is ten times as great as France or Germany and is capable itself of practically accommodating and caring for the population of the world. It has been called the "Nation's bread basket," and potentially it is the greatest producer of freight of any equal area on earth. Nearly one-half of the productive area of our country and more than one-half of the rural population of the United States are within its borders. It contains three-fourths of America's improved farm lands, both in acreage and in value, and produces nearly one-half of all the Nation's lumber and more than one-half of the Nation's wool, and from 60 to 80 per cent of the Nation's live stock, cereals, bituminous coal, petroleum, and iron ore.

All this production must be transported, and much of it must be transported to the sea. If we had not been accustomed to the unreasonable fact it would be ridiculous to even think of carrying this great load of produce which is destined for the seacoast slowly and laboriously up the heavy grade of the Appalachian or Allegheny Mountains in order to reach a seaport, when by far the larger part of the tonnage could be made to practically slide by its own weight down the river to the seacoast at the Gulf.

This Nation has comparatively no raw material on our seacoast; grain, coal, lumber, ore, and oil must be carried to the factory and thence to the sea.

The rivers are the channels of trade for this purpose which God has made. There is no need of eminent domain to condemn at great cost the right of way. It is already there. It needs to have the channel deepened and protected to afford for nine months in the year in every place and for all year in many places a constant thoroughfare of limitless capacity.

It is a problem for the Nation and not for the individual, because the use of waterways can not, in the very nature of the case, be confined to any one company, individual, or association.

The people own the waterways, and a monopoly of the use of this highway is inconceivable.

If Congress were to grant to a private corporation the exclusive use, for example, of the Mississippi, it would be entirely practicable for such private corporation to dredge and preserve the channel of the river, and the financial return to such a corporation from its monopoly would be enormous, but it would be treason to the national welfare to allow such a monopoly, because the people own the waterways and because its use as a great national estate of immeasurable value is precisely the reason why the Nation, and the Nation alone, has both the privilege and the profit and the duty of improving and maintaining these national transportation facilities.

Private capital can not be expected to improve a waterway for the joint use of those who have no investment in its development any more than private capital can be expected to purchase a right of way and build a railroad for others to use as freely as those who have made its use possible.

The Nation must improve the waterways. The Nation must use them. The Nation must control them. The Nation will profit, for the gain from an adequate waterway transportation is distributed among every family who uses food or fuel or utensils of iron or steel and garments of cotton or wool.

Among the great blessings that have come to our country from the war—for there have accrued to us as a Nation great gains as well as great losses—we have developed:

(a) The recognition as never before that nothing is impossible for the American people to accomplish; that no task is beyond our resource and efficiency.

A nation that can, with practical unanimity, enroll 24,000,000 of its manhood, to say nothing of hundreds of thousands of volunteers, for war, the one matter about which we knew least and hated worst, and develop in a night an Army that proved to the world its superiority over trained veterans of autocracies who had made militarism the rule of their life for half a century, is a nation that can approach with confidence any problem that confronts it.

We have destroyed for at least a generation to come the possibility of world domination by military forces. We now have the duty as well as the opportunity of so building our national structure as to secure for ourselves the greatest capacity for world service in supplying out of our inexhaustible resources the needs of the nations of the world.

(b) We have learned the lesson of cooperation that national greatness is worth individual effort and individual sacrifice if necessary; that everything and anything that spells strength or glory or progress to our country is a call to every man to consider and to help.

No question, political or industrial, commercial or agricultural, will ever again be viewed by this country in the same light as it was before the war.

What we have done has solidified the Nation, changed indifference into intelligent interest, and substituted activity for lethargy.

Men have worked as they never thought they could work. Men have given of time and money as they never thought it was possible for them to do.

The reality of actual accomplishment concerning the great inland waterways of the Nation which we are planning and discussing to-day is bound to come, and what we are now framing is but the beginning of a far greater national waterway development.

There are those who see and see clearly through the difficulties of to-day a vision of a great overflowing waterway from Pennsylvania and Minnesota and Illinois and Missouri and through every intervening State, with a channel so deep and a bank so safe that upon its broad bosom is carried to the sea the products of the great agricultural and mineral basin of this country. It is lined on either side with mills and factories, producing food and clothing and manufactures from nature's raw materials, and these products are in turn increasing the mighty traffic upon America's improved inland waterway.

I quote the prophetic words of the first President of these United States, the great Father of this Republic, who rocked this country in the cradle of its national infancy, and who saw as no other man its needs and its possibilities:

> I could not help taking a more contemplative and extensive view of the vast inland navigation of these United States and could not but be struck with the immense diffusion and importance of it; and with the goodness of that Providence which has dealt his favors to us with so profuse a hand. Would to God we may have wisdom enough to improve them.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I do not understand that the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] desires to proceed further this afternoon with the pending bill, and I would like to have a brief executive session.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I understand that the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] would like to take just a few minutes.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am compelled to be absent from the Senate to-morrow owing to an engagement which calls me from the city. I have an amendment to the pending bill, which is in the nature of a substitute. I was very anxious to present it to the Senate and to submit some reasons for its adoption. I sincerely hope that the pending measure will not be disposed of before Monday morning, as I shall return by that time, but if the bill makes such progress to-morrow the chairman of the committee has very courteously agreed to present the substitute which I have submitted and invite the attention of the Senate to its provisions, and I shall ask him to have a vote upon the substitute.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Swem, one of his clerks, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 180) authorizing the Secretary of War to turn over to agricultural fertilizer distributors or users a supply of nitrate of soda.

THE ARMENIAN REPUBLIC.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to say just a few words upon the subject of Armenia. I believe the time has come when the executive department of the Government, by appropriate action, should recognize the Armenian Republic, if not de jure, at least de facto.

The Armenian Republic, as it is now constituted, has an area of about 25,000 to 30,000 square miles and a population of more than 2,000,000. This, of course, does not include that portion of the historic territory of Armenia which is within what was known as Turkish Armenia, but that portion of Armenia which has been within the Turkish territory belongs economically and ethnologically and in every way to Russian Armenia.

As soon as the peace negotiations have been completed and the peace treaty between the allied Governments and their enemies has been carried into execution it is to be hoped that Turkish Armenia shall be united to what is now known as Russian Armenia and that there shall be constituted a strong and progressive and independent government.

The present Government of Armenia, or the Republic of Armenia, is functioning as a national organism. It has its legislative and executive and judicial departments and branches.

It has its schools and all the indicia of progress and of civilization. A great number of the powers of the earth have recognized that Government and are treating with it as an independent government.

I repeat, it is time that our Government should recognize the Republic of Armenia, and I sincerely hope that the executive arm of our Government will see its way clear to speedily accord recognition to the Republic of Armenia.

Some time ago I offered resolutions, three in number, dealing with this question, and with the Turkish question. The one offered on March 10, 1920, contains a resolution—

> That it is the sense of the Senate that the Government of the United States recognize the independence of Armenia under the Government of the Armenian Republic, having its seat at Erivan, in Russian Armenia.

And further—

> That it is the sense of the Senate that the allied powers and the United States forthwith furnish to the Armenian Republic adequate arms, munitions, equipage, and military stores to enable the Armenian Republic to raise and maintain an army for the defense of the liberty and independence of Armenia, the protection of the Armenian people, and the recovery and occupation of the territories from which the Armenians have been driven by the Turks.

Mr. President, it is a very tragic page in the history of our days which records the atrocities and assassinations and murders committed by the Turks upon the Armenian people. I do not know what the allied Governments will do in finally dealing with this problem. Unfortunately, we are given the impression that it is the intention of the allied Governments to maintain the Turks in Europe, to maintain Constantinople as a Turkish city under Turkish domination and control, and compel the Armenian people to submit to Turkish misrule. It looks as though it were the purpose of the allied Governments to compel that part of the Armenian people who reside in what is known as Turkish Armenia to submit longer to the control of the Ottoman Turks.

This procedure, Mr. President, in my opinion, is very unfortunate and very unjust. It is a denial of the right of the Armenian people, which can not commend itself to the judgment or the conscience of the Christian and civilized nations of the world. I hope it is not too late for the allied Governments to accord justice to the Armenian people, to give to them their historic territory, and permit them to erect a government that will take its place among the progressive and intelligent nations of the earth.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After five minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened.

RECESS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Senate take a recess until 12 o'clock noon to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Saturday, April 24, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, April 23, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou Infinite Spirit, Father of all souls, in whom we live and breathe and dwell, aspiring high, even to the throne of Thy divinity, help us to realize that it is deeds not creeds which make for righteousness in the soul.

"Every tub stands on its own bottom." To live honestly, purely, justly, with Thee and our fellow men, is the crucial test for the individual and the Nation. Hasten the day, we beseech Thee, when man's inhumanity to man shall be swallowed up in brotherly love.

"Love never faileth: but whether there be prophecies, they shall fail; whether there be tongues, they shall cease; whether there be knowledge, it shall vanish away.

"For we know in part, and we prophesy in part.

"But when that which is perfect is come, then that which is in part shall be done away.

"When I was a child, I spake as a child, I understood as a child, I thought as a child; but when I became a man, I put away childish things.

"For now we see through a glass darkly; but then face to face: now I know in part; but then shall I know even as also I am known.

"And now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest of these is love."

Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Swem, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had approved and signed bills and joint resolution of the following titles:

On April 17, 1920:

H. R. 1791. An act for the relief of O. W. Lindsley;

H. R. 6291. An act for the relief of E. Willard; and

H. J. Res. 222. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to dispose of surplus dental outfits.

On April 19, 1920:

H. R. 6025. An act to amend the act entitled "An act to establish a code of law for the District of Columbia, approved March 3, 1901," and the acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto.

On April 20, 1920:

H. R. 9065. An act to amend certain sections of the Federal farm-loan act, approved July 17, 1916.

On April 21, 1920:

H. R. 795. An act for the relief of Arthur Wendle Englert;

H. R. 11877. An act granting the consent of Congress to Madison and Rankin Counties, in the State of Mississippi, to construct a bridge across the Pearl River between Madison and Rankin Counties; and

H. R. 12889. An act granting the consent of Congress to the city of Youngstown, Ohio, to construct a bridge across the Mahoning River, at or near Division Street, in the city of Youngstown, Ohio.

On April 23, 1920:

H. R. 12260. An act to amend section 600 of the act approved September 8, 1916, entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes."

SEATING ARRANGEMENTS IN THE HOUSE.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from North Carolina asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss for a minute or so the question of order in the House of Representatives. I believe we all will admit that the order that is maintained in the House when we are transacting business at times is not creditable to a great deliberative body. I was a Member of this House in the days when each Member had his private desk, and I believe that a good deal of the confusion is due to the fact that we have no desks. A Member comes in and takes his seat; he can not write; he has not a place for stationery; and he has got to listen or talk. Now, if the talk is not very entertaining, a good many of us indulge in conversation. Among 435 Members even a low whisper makes it almost impossible to be heard on this floor.

Now, I have introduced a resolution, Mr. Speaker, which provides that the Superintendent of the Capitol, under the supervision of the Committee on Accounts, shall provide a desk for each Member. [Applause.] Of course, if we restore those desks we ought also to restore the old way of drawing seats. I believe that it would greatly promote the transaction of business in this Hall and greatly improve the order that is maintained here if each Member had his desk and also had his own particular seat.

Now, I am informed by Mr. Woods that the expense will not be very great; that a drop-leaf desk can be provided in front of each seat. The seats will have to be arranged so that there will be an inkwell provided on the 4 or 5 inches of desk that the drop leaf is attached to. There ought to be a place for stationery, and also be room enough for the Rules of the House and a Directory.

Now, it seems to me that this is a matter that deserves attention. I will confess that there are times here when, for my part, I am not proud of the order that is maintained in the Hall, and I believe in admitting this I reflect the feeling of many of my colleagues. We are all more or less guilty. The truth is that each man should have his desk, and when he comes into this Hall he should keep as nearly silent as possible, and if he has a place to write of course that is going to be an incentive to silence.

Mr. WALSH. If only drop-leaf desks are provided, what would be the necessity of drawing for seats which, apparently, would not permit the keeping of any of the Members' individual documents and papers? Personally, I would prefer to see the old-fashioned desks restored. [Applause.]

Mr. POU. I was remarking a moment ago that the Superintendent of the Capitol, in explaining this proposed new desk, stated that there would be ample room to provide for a moderate amount of stationery and also for two books—the Rules of the House and for the Directory. It would seem to me, therefore, necessary that, if each Member is going to provide himself with a moderate amount of stationery, it would be necessary for the Member to know exactly where his seat is. Of course, we do not all use the same kind of stationery.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I yield.

Mr. GARRETT. In reference to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts as to the restoration of the old desks, I wish to say that that would be impossible—I mean the old desks that were here. One of the reasons that brought about this unfortunate change—unfortunate, in my opinion—was that the membership of the House had outgrown the desk capacity of the House, and there was not space unoccupied in the Chamber sufficient to add the number of desks to take care of the additional membership following the new representation after the last census.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARRETT. I will.

Mr. WALSH. I did not mean the particular old desks that were here, but I meant individual desks.

Mr. GARRETT. They would have to be smaller.

Mr. WALSH. Smaller than the others; but I think there is plenty of room. If the gentleman will permit, that is not the only old, former custom or practice that I would like to see the House return to. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will permit, I wish to say that there must be taken into consideration, in the passage of his resolution and the action of the Committee on Accounts, the possibility—I hope not—of the increase of the House under the present census; and if you should increase it materially, it would be impossible to put desks of any kind in the Hall.

Mr. POU. I will say to my friend that I believe there is ample room on the respective sides to increase this House by 40 or 50 additional Members and still maintain the desk system that has been suggested.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I will ask the gentleman whether or not he has conferred with the Superintendent of the Capitol as to the advisability and practicability of enlarging this room and cutting out the lobby in the front or south side of this room, and giving us some light and air and ventilation and making this room more sanitary and healthy, so there may be less sickness and death among the membership of this House, and also enlarging the galleries and making this a more commodious Hall? The gallery is not half large enough, and the ventilation is abominable. After every 10-year census this body is going to be increased, the chances are, for the next hundred years or more. This room may have been all right 50 years ago, but it is utterly inadequate, unhealthy, and insufficient for 435 Members of this House and the employees at this time.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. POU. I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Speaker, for two minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I, and I think many others, would be glad to learn that there may now or some time soon be some systematic move taken to improve the conditions of this room as I have mentioned, so that we can get more light, and more fresh air, and more ventilation, and a more healthful room for the House of Representatives to transact the legislative business of this Government in. The gigantic amount of work that is nowadays heaped upon Congress requires the Members of this House to stay in this room, practically speaking, five hours a day for nearly 365 days in every year, and the Members are entitled to and the country would be greatly benefited by this room being made a more healthful place to live and work in.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I can answer the gentleman's question.

Some æsthetic gentleman started in here 8 or 10 years ago to remodel this Hall.

The ex-governor of Massachusetts, Mr. McCall, was the head actor in it, and we passed a resolution, and here is the answer to the gentleman's question: We passed a resolution here to remodel this Hall. I was against it, and I am against it yet, except that I am in favor of tearing out that wall back of the Speaker's stand and running this room out to the other wall. The man that got up this Capitol Building ought to be digged up and hanged yet. [Laughter.] This Hall and the Senate Chamber are rooms inside of rooms. That is the reason why Members and Senators die here so frequently. There is an unhealthy atmosphere here.

I am in thorough accord with one idea of the gentleman from North Carolina. However, we passed that project, and I finally got tired fighting it, because I got tired of the whole thing. Then they appointed a commission—and I think I was one of that commission—to have the Hall rearranged. The plan was to cut off one-fourth of this Hall on the west and take in the reading and writing room and one-fourth on the east, and cut out the lobby and run the Hall back to the back windows, so as to get some fresh air in here. We consulted with Mr. Elliott Woods, who knows everything about the Capitol that a man can know, and the trouble about that proposition is that after the materials were assembled it would take seven months to do it. Now, ever since President Taft was elected President Congress has been in perpetual session, except in 1915, and even during that long vacation all of us expected to be called back here at any time on account of the war then going on in Europe; and so here we are at the end of five or six years without any change in the Hall.

Now, I have one or two ideas to express, without meaning to interrupt the gentleman from North Carolina——

Mr. POU. I am glad to have the gentleman speak.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the gentleman may have five minutes more.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the gentleman's request? There was no objection.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. And after every decennial census since the Government was organized the membership of this House has been increased, except in 1830. Then they absolutely reduced it under that census.

Now, I do not have any doubt about what ought to be done about the size of this House. It is too big. There ought to be a constitutional amendment passed fixing the number of Members of the House at 300, or thereabouts, and keeping it there. [Applause.]

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman from Missouri use his good offices and his influence and his vote in keeping it down to what it is now?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It will all depend upon the question of whether Missouri loses or gains. [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. That is what is the matter, and the gentleman owns up to it. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. I have a very distinct recollection that I led off here 10 years ago trying to reduce the membership of the House to 225 Members, and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was one of the strenuous advocates of increasing the membership. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Well, a man ought to learn somethink in 10 years' time. [Laughter.] I have never had cause to complain about the acoustic properties of this Hall. I have a good strong voice and articulate properly [laughter] and people can hear me. But for the average Member with the average physique and the average voice this House is a pretty tough place in which to undertake to make a speech.

In regard to these desks, just as certain as the world stands the number of Members will be increased under the coming census; just how much it will be increased I do not know. The last time it was increased 44 Members, and one of the strangest facts in history was that the great agricultural States of Arkansas, Indiana, Iowa, Kentucky, Tennessee, Mississippi, Missouri, Kansas, and Nebraska never gained enough population under that census to get any of the new-coming and incoming 44 Members of the House, and that is a fact well worth the thought of the Congress, as to how the very heart of the continent is developing.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. FESS. And if we leave the apportionment as it is now—in other words, if we do not allow the States to increase—those States will likely lose in the next 10 years?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. It may. That is the thing I do not understand. It is the heart of the continent.

Mr. FESS. But it does not grow in population.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I know. The agricultural portion of the country everywhere is falling off in population; the agricultural portion of the country is losing population everywhere. It may not be true out in Oklahoma. That is the latest agricultural State that has come in.

Mr. FESS. If my friend will yield further, I think that is the solution, if we fix the number in the Constitution. Otherwise, we will have it every 10 years, because there is more argument for than against it.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. PADGETT. If I recollect correctly, the last apportionment bill contained a peculiar clause to the effect that the next census should not increase the membership of the next House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. One Congress can not bind another, of course.

Mr. PADGETT. It was a peculiar thing that one Congress should put it in; but nevertheless it was put in.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Missouri suggests a change of the Constitution, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] agrees with him. Now, the gentleman from Ohio is a member of the Committee on Rules. Why should not he bring in a rule to submit the question to Congress and the country?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Oh, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] devotes himself to politics too much for that. [Laughter.] It is a fact that while we have here more than we need to transact the business of the country, yet we have the smallest popular House in any enlightened nation on earth. For example, the House of Commons has 709 members in it, but it takes only 40 members to constitute a quorum in the House of Commons. But we can not change the number constituting a quorum except by constitutional amendment.

Mr. FESS. And the House of Commons has a seating capacity of only four hundred and some.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. They never come in full force except on important occasions, like the disestablishment of the Welsh Church, or something of that kind. Then it is that the country squires stand up.

Now, as to the desks, I am in favor of restoring the desks and restoring the seats. The method of selection of seats was the fairest performance that ever took place anywhere. I remember that in my first Congress I drew first among Democrats and selected the best seat in the House and sat right opposite the venerable Judge Culberson, of Texas, and to commune with him for two years was in itself a liberal education.

The next three times I drew high enough up to get a good seat down here. The next time, coming up on the street car, I told my wife that on the doctrine of probabilities I ought to be the last man in the House to draw a seat, and sure enough, in the drawing I was the next to the last man. [Laughter.] Now, the great astronomer, Proctor, ciphered it out that under the law of probabilities a man would not hold a straight flush more than one time in a million hands.

Mr. WALSH. What is that? [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The idea of a Republican asking that. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I drew good seats six times, and the seventh time I drew the next to the last, but there was a man here from St. Louis who knew he was going to be thrown out, because he was a Democrat [laughter], and he had drawn a seat right down where this table is. So he came to me and said, "They are not going to let me stay here. I have got no use for this seat, and I want you to take it." So I had that one. Now, that method of drawing seats is perfectly fair. Speaker Reed said once that the trouble about that system of drawing seats was that it was diabolically fair. We do not need as big desks as we had here before. They were as big as wagon beds. I wish that rear wall could be torn out and the House extended and the other wall brought up this way and a constitutional amendment adopted to fix the membership at 300.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, it seems to me one of the worst features about the desks was the old custom of every Member speaking from his desk. Often a gentleman would speak from over in one of the extreme corners and you could not hear him. I should hope that our present custom of speaking from the area down in front might be continued.

Mr. GARNER. That could be retained.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The truth is I started that habit of speaking down in the semicircle. I was always telling Members that was the best place to make a speech. They said I had never tried it, so one day when I was going to speak an hour—as a matter of fact, I spoke three hours—I went down here and borrowed a desk from a man sitting in the front row, on which to place books and papers, and I got down in front and made a speech, and other Members began to take it up, and then it became a quite general custom. That is the place to make a speech in this House, instead of the old way that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has referred to.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I should like to ask the gentleman from Missouri what his opinion is about the advantage we now enjoy in being able to assemble the committees in charge of bills around these tables in the center on each side?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. That is a good idea, and there would not be any trouble about continuing that.

Mr. GARNER. Seats could be set aside for committees in charge of bills.

Mr. POU. I am informed by the architect that these tables can be retained as they are.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. With seats reserved for committees?

Mr. POU. Yes.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from North Carolina has expired.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask for one minute more. I merely wanted to bring this matter to the attention of the House, so that Members would be thinking about it. I invite the attention of the Committee on Accounts to the resolution. I believe that by conference with the Superintendent of the Capitol the Committee on Accounts will ascertain that for a very moderate sum desks can be installed sufficient to accommodate the membership of this House, and that that can be done during the recess of Congress, so that when the next session meets in December the desks will be here.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that next Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, I may be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes, and that thereafter the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that on Monday, immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes and that thereafter the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] be permitted to address the House for 40 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I do not intend to object—I hope that if that consent is given, it will include at least 20 or 30 minutes for this side.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I suggest to the gentleman from Iowa that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] have 20 minutes after he has spoken?

Mr. GARNER. I do not know that I will want the time for myself, but I will want it for this side of the House, say 30 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman realizes that his side has already had an hour and a half.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that. I am not complaining, and I am not going to object. You gentlemen can get all the time you desire, no matter whether it is two hours or four hours. I have no objection, but in case you develop any new thought I want time so that it may be replied to by somebody on this side.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I modify my request, and put it in this form, that immediately after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table on Monday I be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes, and that thereafter the gentleman from Texas, or such Members as he may see fit to yield to, have—how much?

Mr. GARNER. Forty minutes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The other side have had an hour and a half.

Mr. GARNER. All right. Thirty minutes will do.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That the gentleman from Texas, or such Members as he may yield to, may have 30 minutes, and that then the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] may have 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request as modified?

Mr. KINCHELOE. Reserving the right to object, is this to be on the bonus legislation? I imagine it is.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, under the rules of the House next Monday is set aside for the consideration of business reported from the Committee on the District of Columbia. It has been a long time since that committee has had a day, and there is a good deal of important business on the calendar reported by the District Committee. It seems to me that the day set aside for that purpose should not be occupied by speeches.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MAPES. I object for the present.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Then I modify my request by asking that the same order that I have requested heretofore for Monday be permitted for next Tuesday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his request to make it apply to Tuesday. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, why not have it to-morrow? We will all be in town.

Mr. KNUTSON. We want Saturday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request for Tuesday?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may proceed for five minutes. I want to say a word with respect to this desk business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes on the desk question. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Speaker, I did not get into the House until the gentleman from North Carolina had presented and developed his idea. Perhaps nothing I could say would convince the membership of the House, but I do desire to suggest one or two considerations. This is the most difficult body to address in the world. Few ever get attention except under extraordinary situations. A Member usually has to fight his way for a hearing.

The restoration of the desks will increase this disorder. Every revolving chair is a gatling gun of confusion and disorder. Every rustling paper, every lifting and lowering and falling desk top, is distraction and confusion of the public business. I do not know of a parliamentary body where its lower house has desks for its individual members.

Mr. RAYBURN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. For a question.

Mr. RAYBURN. I was in the house of representatives in Virginia, and they have desks there.

Mr. MONTAGUE. I was speaking of national assemblies. We do have them in some, if not all, of the State assemblies, and the suggestion of my good friend from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] brings to my mind that I am speaking from experience. But it should be observed that the State legislatures do not provide offices for their members.

Desks present a very disorderly appearance from the gallery. It is a picture of disorder and confusion, and this disorderly arrangement is actually augmented by revolving chairs and by Members going back and forth to get behind and to sit down at their desks. As the gentleman suggested, it breaks up your committee plan of carrying on business in this House. I hope the House does not misunderstand me as dogmatizing about the matter. My hope is that while we are thinking of this question some Member should express its inadvisability from fundamental reasons and for the reason that I do not see why we should at this time incur the expenditure incident to such a change.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. It was suggested that in some State assemblies they have the desks, but in these States practically all of the members have no offices.

Mr. MONTAGUE. Yes; and I understand that one reason for the Office Building was that we might transact much of our business in the offices and not at the desks in the House.

In conclusion, may I express the hope that some time before I leave the House I may get the opportunity to present my views in keeping mainly with a committee report heretofore made for the completion of the Capitol? The old part of this building has never been completed. It is a patchwork of two marble wings and a painted stone structure in the middle. There are very essential architectural reasons, as well as of public convenience and necessity, that suggest the completion of the central portion of the Capitol. But, if I may repeat, I do not know of anything that would so enhance the reputation of this body in the opinion of the American people as better order in our procedure and deliberation. [Applause.]

ADJOURNMENT OVER.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday next.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn until Monday next. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

THE PILGRIM TERCENTENARY CELEBRATION.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, under the previous order of the House I call up House joint resolution 302 and ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the preamble.

The SPEAKER. This is on the Union Calendar.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that House joint resolution 302 be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. MORGAN. I object.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of House joint resolution 302.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the House joint resolution of which the Clerk will read the title.

The Clerk read as follows:

Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 302) authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

Mr. WALSH. Pending that, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that general debate on the resolution may be limited to one hour, one half to be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the other half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS].

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that general debate be limited to one hour, one-half to be controlled by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and one-half by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS]?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. WALSH was then agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. LEHLBACH in the chair.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the reading of the preamble of the resolution be dispensed with.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the preamble. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, why not read the preamble? It is the only informing part of the resolution.

Mr. WALSH. This has all been printed once and the preamble will probably be eliminated by way of amendment.

Mr. GARD. Is it the purpose to explain the resolution independently of the preamble?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, hereinafter referred to as the commission, and to be composed of nine commissioners as follows: Three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; two Senators by the President of the Senate; and four Representatives by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commissioners shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

SEC. 2. (a) That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $400,000, to be expended by the commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

(b) One hundred thousand dollars of such appropriation may be expended under the direction of the commission and in cooperation with the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission, the town of Provincetown, Mass., and such other agencies, public or private, as the commission may determine, for the purpose of completing and improving the approaches to and the grounds of the Pilgrim Monument at Provincetown, Mass.; of erecting suitably inscribed tablets or markers in the towns of Provincetown, Truro, Wellfleet, and Eastham, and for other work in connection therewith, in accordance with plans adopted by the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission.

(c) Three hundred thousand dollars of such appropriation may be expended under the direction of the commission and in cooperation with the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, the town of Plymouth, Mass., and such other agencies, public or private, as the commission may determine, for the purpose of restoring and improving Plymouth Rock and the shore line of the locality adjacent thereto, of protecting and improving the burial grounds upon Coles Hill and Burial Hill in Plymouth, Mass.; of erecting tablets or markers at appropriate places in the Old Colony, and for other work in connection therewith, in accordance with plans adopted by the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission.

SEC. 3. That no expenditure shall be made or authorized by the commission until the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has, as determined by the commission, expended or contracted to expend the sum of $300,000 for the same purpose for which the commission may under the provisions of this resolution make expenditures. The United States shall not be held liable for any cost, expense, obligation, or indebtedness on account of the maintenance or upkeep of any property in respect to which any expenditure is made by the commission under the provisions of this resolution, nor for any obligation or indebtedness incurred by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission, the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, or any other agency or officer, employee, or agent thereof, for any purpose for which the commission may under the provisions of this resolution make expenditures. All expenditures of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission, but no expenditure shall be made or authorized by the commission except with the approval of a majority of the commissioners.

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to issue a special series of postage stamps, in such denominations and of such design as he may determine, commemorative of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this resolution shall expire December 31, 1921.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 3, line 7, strike out the word "two" and insert in lieu thereof the word "four."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE], to be used as he may desire.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, this resolution provides for Federal participation in the observance of one of the very important events relating to our Nation's history. I do not desire to take up any time to call to the attention of the House the significance of this event, nor the wonderful happenings which have occurred since that hardy band landed on the shores of Massachusetts Bay. Heretofore the Nation has participated in commemorating these historical events by contributing a sum of money to States and associations which have conducted fairs and expositions, but in this instance the people of Massachusetts, through the appointment by their legislature of special commissions, have adopted a program which does not include any world's fair or exposition or any matter of such transitory nature, with the possible exception of some historical exercises which it is hoped will be held during the summer of 1921, but which is for the most part to be permanent in form. These exercises will consist probably of a pageant to be repeated upon certain days of the week running over possibly three or four weeks during that summer. Naturally one would expect that feature to occur this coming summer of 1920, preceding the three hundredth anniversary date, but because of the war and of the participation in the war by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and our Nation plans could not be properly completed, and the funds were not deemed to be available for launching that feature for this summer.

The commissions have proposed plans of making certain public improvements. Plymouth Rock is to be restored to its original base. It now rests upon a bed of concrete, having been raised several feet above the former shore line. It is proposed to drop it back and restore the former shore line, to take away some unsightly buildings and fish piers, and to make of that portion of the harbor a public shrine which can be visited and made accessible both by water and by approach from street or highway. It is proposed in the vicinity of Provincetown to erect some tablets or markers in connection with the first visit of the Pilgrims at that place, and to improve and make safe the approach to the massive Pilgrim Monument which was erected there by State, Federal, and public subscription and contributions some years since. During the coming season it is hoped that this work of reconstruction and restoration may proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

Mr. WALSH. Could the gentleman yield me five minutes more?

Mr LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes more to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, it is also proposed to protect the burying grounds at Plymouth, where rest the remains of those who died during the first winter and the years following. The town of Plymouth itself has appropriated $320,000 for the erection of a memorial building, where it is hoped the opening exercises on December 21 may be held this present year. I believe that while it has not been customary for the Government to indulge in assisting in making permanent improvements, we might well decide to assist in this project at this particular time in the way proposed.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARD. Does subsection (c) of section 2 on page 4 contemplate the financial cooperation by the United States with the town of Plymouth for the erection of a memorial hall?

Mr. WALSH. No. The appropriation by the Federal Government will be available only for cooperation with the funds made available for the State commission. The building to be erected by the town of Plymouth is to be erected under the jurisdiction of a committee of the town, and the money has already been appropriated and the site acquired. The work I understand is already under way. This participation by the Government will be only for the restoration of Plymouth Rock, the making of a public shrine of that particular part of the shore front, and restoring and improving the two burial grounds at Plymouth, together with the placing of some tablets at certain historic spots in Plymouth Colony and at Provincetown, and assisting in making the approach to the monument safe and more accessible.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SMALL. I notice in section 2, subsection (c), that $300,000 is appropriated, and that among other things authorized is the restoring and improving of Plymouth Rock and the shore line of the locality adjacent thereto. That necessarily will require the services of engineers. I do not want to suggest any amendment that would interfere with the plans that have been matured, but I suggest to the gentleman the advisability of so amending that section as to authorize the commission to call upon the Chief of Engineers for any services which the Corps of Engineers may render.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I am not positive, so that I do not wish to make the positive assertion, but I believe that has been done by the State commission. I think that the proposed restoration, which simply consists of taking away some filling of land which has been put into an embankment, will permit the rock to be restored to its original base, and the water will then come up around the rock.

But by filling that in and raising the rock of course they have changed the relative location of the rock to the original shore line.

Mr. SMALL. Have the plans already been made by competent engineers?

Mr. WALSH. They have under the jurisdiction of the State commission and I believe the waterways commission, whatever its title is, of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Mr. SMALL. Then it will probably not contribute to the success of the enterprise or effect any economy by authorizing the commission to call upon the Chief of Engineers?

Mr. WALSH. I doubt if it would, although I have no objection. I believe that possibly the resolution in its present form would permit the Federal commission to call upon the Board of Engineers without direct authorization.

Mr. SMALL. I think it is doubtful.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. GREEN of Iowa having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had receded from its amendment numbered 53 to the bill (H. R. 12610) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

THE PILGRIM TERCENTENARY CELEBRATION.

The committee resumed its session.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK.] [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, I am very much in favor of this resolution. There are certain great events in our history that are a kind of series of milestones in our marvelous progress—the discovery of America; the settlement of Jamestown, Va.; the landing at Plymouth Rock; the Declaration of Independence; the adoption of the Constitution of the United States; the Louisiana Purchase; and the annexation of Texas. [Applause.] Those are the great historic events or markers in our march. Every one of them ought to be celebrated. The discovery of Columbus has been celebrated, the Jamestown landing or settlement has been celebrated, the Declaration of Independence has been celebrated, the adoption of the Constitution of the United States has been celebrated, the Louisiana Purchase—the greatest transaction in real estate that ever was suggested in the world since the devil took the Savior to the top of a high mountain and offered him the dominion of the world—was adequately celebrated, and whenever the hundredth anniversary of the Battle of San Jacinto comes around I am in favor of putting the big pot in the little one and celebrating that. [Applause.] Of course, the landing of the Pilgrims has been celebrated in history, in story, and in song, but it is a great event in the history of the world. When we celebrated the Louisiana Purchase the Congress gave them $5,000,000, and I believe really it was the greatest show of the sort that was ever held in the world. These are all matters of vast importance in their effect and they are all matters of which we can all be proud. The day has come when we are all the same sort of people anyway; we used to have differences but they are gone. If these people up in Massachusetts want to celebrate the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims I hope they will do it in great shape, and I have no doubt they will. And because I believe these things and because Congress treated us so well when we celebrated the Louisiana Purchase, I think that we ought to adopt this resolution and give this money. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself eight minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts is recognized for eight minutes.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, the program contemplated for the celebration has been adequately set forth by my colleague [Mr. WALSH], and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] has excellently stated the fundamental reasons why great historical occurrences should be commemorated. Let me dwell chiefly upon the especial reasons why, in spite of the conditions of the hour, it may well be the decision of the Congress to make an appropriation supplementing that of the State of Massachusetts in this particular matter. I would emphasize the value of the lessons to be drawn from the settlement at Plymouth in view of the present juncture in our national affairs. Nothing can be of more service than by pageant and parade, feast and festival, celebration and commemoration, to break into the routine life of the Nation long enough to recall the purpose of the Puritans in crossing what one of them aptly described as "the vast and furious ocean." We can hardly imagine the dread, the terror, that journey must have brought to the hundred or so of Pilgrims who made the voyage. Leaving everything dear behind them, facing the unknown wilderness, they had in mind chiefly their desire to worship God according to the dictates of conscience. They brought here the ideal of freedom and liberty. Surely at no time in the 300 years that have since passed has it been more important to pay tribute to that purpose. The tenacity with which they pursued it, their patience under misfortune, their refusal, after the loss of half their number in that first dreadful winter, to return whence they came, their forbearance with each other, their determination to give everything they had to accomplish their end—these are lessons worth spreading to-day.

We ought to pause long enough to recall that they were the men who first of all in the history of all mankind set their names to an agreement to form a civil body politic, the very first such agreement that history records, the germ of a constitution. Thereby they laid the foundation of the American system of self-government under liberty.

One feature of their first year or two here that is not commonly known would be of especial value to bring to the knowledge of all the people of the land by this commemoration. They attempted a communistic settlement. Communism, the cry of the hour by so many radicals—communism at the very outset of the foundation of New England had its full and fair test, and communism failed. Only when they had abandoned the communistic idea and secured an agreement that each should enjoy the fruits of his labors, that what each might wrench from the stubborn soil should be the reward of his efforts, that their fields and homes should no longer be held in common—only then was the colony put upon a basis of possible permanence.

Read the story in Bradford's manuscript, so happily restored to us through the efforts of that great Senator from Massachusetts, Senator Hoar. Gov. Bradford's record tells how these men tried to work out the experiment that to-day is held up as a solution of our problems, and how they failed, just as have failed every other group of men since then who have attempted to do without the spur of ambition, the spur of hope, and by throwing individualism in the common cauldron have hoped to make it boil for the common welfare.

Plymouth shared with Massachusetts Bay in developing what historians and students of political science have declared the greatest contribution that America has made to the science of government—the town meeting. In these two colonies men began to show the capacity to handle their local affairs without the control of superiors. Although after a fashion this was a repetition of the Swiss landsgemeinde, it was not a copy of the Swiss prototype, but the outgrowth of the Puritan spirit, the natural product of men who brought here the ideal of self-government.

Because of the inspiration of their lives, because of the institutions they developed, institutions that have spread the influence of their ideals to the farthermost corners of the land, because of the gratitude that all the people should show to the forefathers who landed 300 years ago on Plymouth Rock, we ought at this time to pay our national debt of gratitude by fitting commemoration. [Applause.]

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE].

Mr. MONTAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to express my warm concurrence in the purposes of this resolution, and my sincere approval of the very modest, but at the same time effective, method of memorialization therein provided. I congratulate the Commonwealth of Massachusetts that it has divorced itself from the customary adjuncts of such celebrations, and that it lays hold of those more lasting monuments, physically and artistically expressive and preservative of a great structural event, and of the nourishing traditions and influences flowing therefrom.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has been modest in its requests, and this House should respond with very great alacrity, as I am sure it will. The Nation honors itself in honoring this mighty event.

Of the event I can not now speak. It could not be done in two or three minutes. I would, however, observe that perhaps at no period in American history could this celebration be quite so fortunate as at this time. With the disturbed condition of the American people, following in the wake of an immeasurable catastrophe, with dissolving confidence, with diminishing faith, with failing appreciation of dignity and faith in our institutions and in our civilization, the time is most fortunate and appropriate that we recall and celebrate, and that we make a lasting memorial of an event so full of powerful influences and nourishing traditions as the settlement at Plymouth and its consequent development through the governmental agency of a majestic Commonwealth, Massachusetts, whose influence, moral, economic, social, and political, has spread throughout the length and breadth of our Republic. [Applause.]

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GARRETT]. [Applause.]

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I have not given any particular attention to the details of this measure, but I understand in a general way that its purpose is to make a modest contribution on the part of the Republic to the celebration of the tercentennial anniversary of one of the great outstanding events of history. I think the Nation may very well contribute to honor the coming of the Pilgrims, because the Pilgrims and their descendants have contributed so much to the honor of the Nation. It would be an affectation unworthy the candid spirit and frank soul of the Pilgrims themselves if we did not say that the chapter of their history is something of a blend, that there are some faults which are very, very human intertwined with those virtues which are divine. But the great outstanding thing is that the resolute courage, the immeasurable faith, which moved those dauntless souls to embark upon a strange ocean in order to settle in a strange, wild land has permeated the spirit of great commonwealths and thrust its roots deep into the very life of this Federal Union itself. Few influences in history since the Christ sent forth his group of 12 from down by the marshes of the mystic sea have more ramified peoples and nations than has the spirit of those plain and sturdy Pilgrim pioneers.

If there are times when, reading the literature produced by these people and that people whom they so profoundly influenced, we find indications of a disposition to emphasize their achievements without giving to some of our other sections all the credit that we should like to have, we can yet forgive it, because we consciously recognize that their achievements and their characters were profoundly great and their pride of tradition is legitimate. Through three spacious centuries the virtues of that people have permeated the life of the Nation and have joined with the virtues of the other sections of the Republic in keeping alive the spirit of freedom, in holding aloft the torch of liberty, and in preserving those institutions of government which we believe are best adapted to the everlasting maintenance of that freedom and that liberty; and for my own part it gives me pleasure to be able to join in paying this tribute of a Nation to one of the greatest of the influences that founded that Nation. [Applause.]

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I do not flatter myself that I can add anything to the many beautiful things that have already been said with reference to the passage of this resolution. In all probability it would be like trying to gild refined gold, or add another color to the rainbow, or paint the lily, or give perfume to the rose. But some time since I had the privilege of addressing the Massachusetts Society, and on that occasion I promised myself the honor and the pleasure of saying a few words in connection with this resolution when it reached the floor for consideration.

I have often wondered why Robert Weir, the great artist, did not paint the "Landing of the Pilgrims," instead of the "Embarkation of the Pilgrims," one of the eight beautiful pictures under the dome of this Capitol; pictures that portray the romance, the glory, the martial greatness, and the thrill of American life in unforgetable colors; pictures that are viewed with emotion, patriotism, pride, and wonder by admiring men and women from every part of our broad land every day in the year by thousands.

I sometimes think that he wished to start a train of thought in the mind of the beholder that could not be accomplished in any other way than by the solemnity of that leave-taking of the Old World and its ideas by that historic band of God-fearing men and women. The landing follows in natural sequence and the wonders that the Puritans were to perform unfold themselves to us in clearness and chronological order.

Some one said long ago, very beautifully, that Venus sprang from the foam of the sea, and Minerva leaped, armed, cap-a-pie, from the brain of Jove. These classic stones suggest that the landing of the Pilgrims gave us New England and cradled that magnificent Commonwealth which is known by the name of Massachusetts—a name that is mentioned by Americans with a thrill of pride and emotion from ocean to ocean. As the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] said some time since, here, very feelingly and eloquently, no one need set himself up as a painter of Massachusetts; no one need sing the song or the pean of her glory. As Webster said, with all the dignity of a great American from Massachusetts, "There she stands." That Commonwealth has given to this country poets and philosophers and sages, great and splendid men who have inseparably associated the name of Massachusetts with the glory and the greatness of the United States of America.

Why, my friends, when I think of the influence of that splendid band of men that landed at Plymouth Rock in 1620, I know the force and meaning of the expression, "Great oaks from little acorns grow." From that landing 300 years ago has come an influence which has never ceased to operate on American life; an influence that has affected every chapter in our history and given to America that resolute, dauntlesss attitude which results from a veneration of the Bible and a reverence for the ideals of Christianity. Down in Louisiana we have felt that inspiring "touch of a vanished hand and the sound of a voice that is still." We can never forget that it was Longfellow who wrote the beautiful, the immortal, Evangeline. The trials of Evangeline and Gabriel are the stories of southern Louisiana and are dear to our ears. The blood of the Pilgrims has come into our life and is abroad in the land. I have to acknowledge the magnificent things that the Puritan has done for American life. I not only acknowledge it; I glory in it. During my own recollection, Mr. Chairman—and that does not go much beyond 49 years—I can remember the time when, if a man lost his way in southern Louisiana and did not speak French, he would never find his way to the Mississippi River; and to-day, when that splendid and gallant people speak English as fluently as they do French, when they understand the history of their country and glory in its victories and magnificent achievements, if one is asked what has been the mighty influence that has worked that change during that period of, say, 45 years, the answer is, "The Puritan is abroad in the land." Verily, he has done noble things, and I thank God that he is abroad in the land.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. O'CONNOR. May I have a minute more?

Mr. DOREMUS. Yes; I yield to the gentleman one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana is recognized for one additional minute.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Their achievements need no orator, no rhetorician. They speak for themselves in every line of our national life and history. I mean that they need not be recited, so far as this House is concerned, because in every face that I see before me I read the realization of her majestic figure and her long and noble record. Massachusetts, Virginia, the discovery of the Mississippi River, Bunker Hill, and Yorktown, the Louisiana Purchase, the Battle of New Orleans, are unforgetable memories. May their glory never fade. May they live on in memory, to come back to chase the gloom of sad events away. My friends, may I recall to your minds that which I know will not fade away from it, and that is that your great monuments, your splendid victories, the romantic chapters written in the affairs of this country, should never be forgotten by the people in any generation? [Applause.] They are the dream and the glory of a country, the voice that comes from the long ago to keep alive the truths of human existence, to keep us mindful of the heartaches, the privations, the suffering of the men and women who toiled and moiled to make this country the Republic it is, the greatest that ever history knew. They should be never lost sight of, and our children should know their value. Thrill, then, with its tang and its young and brave life. "Ye shall know the truth; and the truth shall make you free." [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Louisiana has again expired.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Chairman, how much time have we remaining on this side?

The CHAIRMAN. Nine minutes.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield seven minutes to the gentleman from Alabama.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I read these headlines from a Birmingham daily:

Labor is branded as time waster and extravagant.

These are the headlines over a statement made by one of the great employers of my district.

I have read many such headlines in the past few months, and many such interviews, coming from similar sources, and I am tempted to ask the great employers of America and the critics who repeat their charges against the men who toil, not merely against members of labor organizations but all men who toil in any capacity: What has been done for labor that it should be thrifty, prudent, and industrious? What has been done for the benefit of men who toil with their hands that they should keep production at the high-water mark?

THE LAW OF COMPENSATION.

And I would say to the great employers and to their echoes who repeat these charges, "The law of compensation is immutable. Men give in proportion to what they receive. Labor returns in service in fair proportion to the justice which is meted out to it. Deal with labor unjustly and you have either a total failure or a decrease in production. Force upon labor unjust wages and unfair conditions and you will have your strikes, either off the job or on the job." The world should understand that by now.

The fundamental fault of many of those who undertake to deal with labor is that they assume that men who work with their hands are a different sort of men from those who follow other occupations. In their ignorance they start out with the assumption that because a man does manual work he is a different kind of man and has different emotions and mainsprings of action from men who work solely with their minds.

Of course, it is a commonplace to say that the men who work with their hands are our full brothers. They are exactly the same kind of men we are. They love justice just as much as we do. They have their faults just as we have. We must deal with them accordingly.

DEMOCRACY AND JUSTICE IN INDUSTRY.

What has been done for labor that it should hold to the maximum of production? Labor made its sacrifices during the war. It was carried on by a high tide of idealism. It was told, "We are fighting to make the world safe for democracy. We are going to bring democracy home to ourselves and take it into our workshops and make justice a living part of industry." That was what they heard during the war.

But at once when the armistice was signed labor was dismayed to find marshaling and organizing against it from one end of the country to the other the great employer classes in a way which indicated their firm resolve to go back to the old conditions—to the old fight between the man who toils and the man he works for; to go back to the old system of strikes and labor troubles and grinding and exploitation. Labor was dismayed, disheartened, and disgusted.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR EMASCULATED.

The Department of Labor has been practically emasculated by this Congress; its employment service, intended to get men jobs, has been disbanded; every criticism that could be uttered has been cast at the Department of Labor and at every officer connected with it upon false charges of unfair partiality to the men who work and to their organizations. Was this encouraging? Did it tend to promote contentment or to increase production?

When Mr. Gary stood at the Industrial Conference, he held the industrial conditions of America in the hollow of his hand; he decided against the rule of harmony and fair consideration in labor disputes; decided in favor of the old and not a new and enlightened system, for the old state of economic warfare between the men who work and the men who employ. Because of him the Industrial Conference failed. Did that encourage labor? Did that tend to cause the toilers to work harder and spill their sweat more freely?

LABOR DID NOT PROFITEER.

I commend to the great employer interests of this country the text that "Whatsoever ye sow, that shall ye also reap." I ask them, in all kindness, and with an eye single to the public welfare, what have they sown that they should reap production from the men who toil?

As soon as the war was over a false and raucous cry went up from the employer interests that labor had profiteered during the war; that it had been unpatriotic. There was not a word of truth in it. Labor had made great sacrifices.

I made an investigation at the time, and I know whereof I speak. The facts are that labor had received from 1914 until the armistice was signed an average increase in wages for all callings of only 34½ per cent. But during that same period the cost of living had increased above 80 per cent. The workingman was receiving $1.34 for the same amount of work that he got $1 for before the war, but he was paying $1.82 for a dollar's worth of the necessaries of life to support his family.

Yet no publicity was given to the true facts through the great channels of publicity. The facts were suppressed, and the false charge that labor had profiteered and had been unpatriotic was echoed all over the country. It was done in the interest of the great employers for the vicious purpose of discrediting labor and preparing the way for the assault that has followed upon it. Ought that to increase production? Is that calculated to make the man who works to work harder and sweat a few drops more?

LABOR THE VICTIM OF THE PROFITEERS.

Labor is being shamelessly profiteered upon, but the profiteering interests have control of the channels of publicity. They suppress the fact that wages are not advancing in proportion to the cost of living. You do not hear much about that. You hear a lot of lies about workingmen buying silk shirts and riding in automobiles. The fact is that the cost of living is going up fast all the time. In February, 1920, the cost of living was 105 per cent more than in February, 1913. Those are the official figures. No one who knows anything about the situation will say that wage earners have received a proportionate increase.

Does the bloodthirsty rapacity of the profiteers, of which the masses are the peculiar victims, with no governmental hand raised for their effective protection, tend to increase production? Is that a reason why labor should be content, why men should work harder?

RAILROAD EMPLOYEES BETRAYED.

In August last the shop crafts of railroad employees were bitterly dissatisfied. They cried out for relief; they could endure it no longer. In my own city several thousands of them left their work. For several days work was suspended. Word came back from those in authority: "Be easy, go back to work; we will reduce the cost of living; be content with what you are receiving now, and we will bring the prices down." Those men went back to their jobs, back to their lathes, and took up their hammers. They went on with their work.

Prices did not come down and wages were not increased to meet them. The employees were quieted with these false promises until just before Congress turned the railroads back into private ownership—then, it was said, "We can not afford to raise wages now; we are just about to turn the roads back to the private owners; deal with them." You gentlemen know what happened as soon as the roads were turned back into private ownership. Do you think that the employees got a square deal? Do you think they will work harder because a fraud was practiced on them? Does that kind of treatment make for full production?

THE ESCH-CUMMINS BILL.

You gentlemen know how the railroad employees of this country opposed with all their power the passage of the iniquitous railroad legislation. You know how they exerted themselves to defeat it; you know how they told you they would accept your action upon that measure as the final test of the friendliness of Congress toward labor. You saw what followed, and yet gentlemen get up on the floor here and complain that labor is fighting them at home in their districts because they voted for that measure.

What do they expect? What do they think the railroad men ought to do? What did they expect the laboring men of this country to do? To lie down and forget? To increase production?

Oh, I told you then that there was nothing that could save a man who voted for that legislation except ignorance on the part of his constituents. I stick to that statement now. Labor has found out what was done to it, but the great public, not interested in labor questions, have not yet found out what was done. But, mark you, they are rapidly finding out, and woe unto those who voted for that measure if their constituents find out before November!

Was there anything to conciliate labor or to incite it to higher efforts in connection with the strong arm suppression of the coal strike? You gentlemen remember the resolution adopted by Congress, how although it pretended to be aimed at lawlessness, its real purpose was to strike down the men who were asking for better wages in the coal industry. Was there anything about that to encourage labor—to make it more productive?

The coal miners were harried; their funds were seized; their leaders were jailed; the action taken against them by the Government was unprecendented in legal history; it was based upon an interpretation of a war law never intended to have such application, a law which had been suspended in its application to the coal operators, but which was used to its fullest and most drastic effect against the miners. Federal troops were employed to awe them; the processes of courts were hung over their heads; deputy marshals were sent into the mining camps, not to execute process, not in pursuance of any lawful duty imposed upon them, but to intimidate the miners and drive them back to work.

The strike was broken, but did it leave the miners peaceful and contented? Did they feel that they had received justice? Did they believe that the Government was on the side of their employers? What was there about the way by which the strike was broken to produce more faithful and industrious workers?

RAIDS ON ALIENS.

You gentlemen have read in the newspapers about the raids upon aliens—unconstitutional raids, raids without process of law, raids in which American citizens, women as well as men, were arrested, beaten, dragged to jail and held without legal process. The charge against them—against all but very few of them—was not that they were revolutionists in real intent and purpose, not that they had any conscious desire or purpose to overthrow the Government of the United States or to subvert law and order, but that they were members of the Communist Labor Party, a political organization.

A well-informed editor of New York City said to me that a great many of those who were arrested did not so much as know the difference between "Bolshevism" and "rheumatism." They were illiterate, they were poor, they were friendless, aliens many of them, and far from home. They were not voters and they had no money; they had no voice, and so they had no champion.

That raid was made for punitive purposes. It was aimed at manual labor as a class; its purpose was to intimidate workers as a class. It was to strike terror into the heart of every foreigner in this country and to make him feel that he dare not claim higher wages or to take part in a strike for fear he would be sent back to some bloody land where his life would be forfeited.

Mr. BOX. Mr. Chairman, I merely wanted to know if the gentleman had read the evidence in those cases.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I am familiar with the evidence in a great many of those cases and am able to say to the gentleman that in less than one out of four of them was there any evidence whatever that the man was consciously an enemy of the American Government.

Mr. BOX. I want to ask the question, If a man makes application for membership in an organization that is communistic and lawless in nature and pays his dues month after month, on what ground does the gentleman base the claim of innocent action in such a case?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I would say to the gentleman that he is of the same erroneous impression as a great many other men. Very few of those arrested had paid dues, many did not know that they were members, very few had any fair idea of the principles of the Communist Party.

The gentleman assumes that the Communist Party is a lawless organization; it is perhaps doubtful that it can be so called. I read its manifesto in some newspaper at the time it was organized last fall. There was a lot of stuff in it about "direct action," "mass action," and economic "revolution." You could not tell what it really did mean. The Secretary of Labor, after puzzling his head over it for a long time, has decided that the manifesto calls for forcible revolution. Perhaps he is right. But the point I make is that only a few of those caught in the raid had any real knowledge that they belonged to a party which advocated force.

Numbers of those arrested were women. Numbers of the men arrested were American citizens. They were beaten and dragged off to jail. The citizens were subsequently weeded out and released, as were also a great many others who had been arrested and against whom no charges whatever were made. Many private homes were invaded without legal process, furniture was broken up, wives and children insulted, and husbands dragged away. Private papers were seized and carried off for evidence. There was no process of law for any of this, but the newspapers had been tipped off so as to get big stories. The parties arrested were denied bail, some of them for months, and cash bail in a large sum was the usual demand. Warrants were subsequently sworn out for such of the arrested parties as were held, and hearings are being had before the Secretary of Labor. Out of some 1,300 cases in which he has held hearings over 900, so I am reliably informed, have been discharged as innocent.

These raids on ignorant aliens no doubt had an effect, but what effect? Do they love America more? Is it yet their ideal as a place of refuge and justice? Will they make better citizens? Do they respect our Government more? Will they work harder? They may not strike, but will the output come from the factory where they are employed? Oh, a lawless people is bad enough, but a lawless government is infinitely worse.

We turned the railroad employees over to the mercy of the managers. You know how little comfort they got. Their wages are inadequate. No informed man will deny that. And when negotiations failed, the labor leaders were discredited. They had counseled quiet and patience, and in the hope of relief the workers had yielded, but the leaders' policy of patience and forbearance failed. The employer interest forced the leaders of labor into a position which destroyed their influence. Did that make for industry and increased production?

THE "OUTLAW" STRIKE.

No; for the employees broke away from their leaders. They started their "outlaw" strike. A plain strike, with the obvious cause of inadequate wages, aggravated by broken promises and the passage of the railroad legislation. The strike is lost, as, of course, all outlaw strikes must be, but it was not permitted to die its natural death. "The strikers were lead by Reds, Bolsheviks, and revolutionists." That is the charge. The strikers know this is not true. They stagger under a false charge. I wonder if those who made the charge think that these wronged workers will produce more because of it—will they work harder?

HARD TIMES AHEAD—GOOD SENSE NEEDED.

We are drifting; sane financiers look forward with apprehension. Hard times are ahead. Times are coming that will try men's souls—men will be out of work by thousands, prices will remain high, and there will be no wages to pay them. There will be suffering, great suffering, unless human foresight be vain. We have need in this country for patience and good fellowship. We need it now more than ever before. Yet the great employers drive on and on with their processes of force. What will be the outcome?

I am hoping for the dominant classes of the country a little of sound sense and good feeling. I beg of them to stay their hands. They may be driving for ruin. I beg of them the exercise of good sense if they have no will for the exercise of the principles of brotherhood and Christianity. They are likely to destroy that which they would most preserve. I call them again to the law of compensation. You can not get good work unless you give justice to the worker. You can not get good feeling out of those who consider themselves wronged. The way to get production in industry is for the employer to do justice in industry.

And I would say that the law of compensation applies as well to government as to industry. Just governments are always loved. Just governments never lack defenders. Governments, like employers, in the end receive what they deserve, whether of good or ill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS] has two minutes remaining.

Mr. DOREMUS. I yield that two minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, our Pilgrim forefathers diligently tilled the fertile soil of this country and forced therefrom a livelihood by the sweat of their brows. The distinguished leader of the minority [Mr. CLARK of Missouri] this morning called to our attention the fact that since the census of 1850 there has been a gradual and continuous decrease in the proportion of population in the agricultural centers of this Nation. What is it that is drawing the boys from the farms to the cities? During the last 50 years the farmer and his wife and children have arisen in the morning before day and worked continuously until after sundown, braving the elements, working in the hot sun and the cold weather, withstanding the ravages of the drought and grasshoppers, and the hail which destroys his crops when practically made, and likewise the destruction of the boll weevil, and the bollworm, and the corn borer, and the grain rust, and the floods, and everything so constantly appearing that the farmer has to contend with, causing frequent crop failures one year after another. Then after he finally makes a crop, who is it that clamors for the minimum price on everything he produces? It is the consuming man in the city, the city laborer, and the mechanic who gets from $8 to $11 a day in the city for working only a part of the hours that the farmer works, and suffering none of the hardships of the farm. That is what has brought the men from the farms to the cities. The farmers have found all these things out. I will say to my friend from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] that that is the question that confronts us and that we have to meet. Should the farmers refuse to produce, his people in Birmingham would starve to death.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LUCE. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS].

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] is recognized for seven minutes.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the character of the report that was written by a colleague of mine on the Committee on the Library [Mr. LUCE]. I think if the membership of the Committee of the Whole will examine this report they will find that it is not the usual report. It is rather a classic along the lines of committee reports. The celebration for which this is proposed is not the usual one. When the bill was presented to the committee, carrying the authorization of an appropriation of $400,000, there was a suggestion as to whether it was not rather large, unless there was going to be some world's fair celebration, which is the usual method of historic observance. It was looked into, and the committee unanimously believed that the plan proposed by the author of the bill was better than the usual world's fair celebration; that it would be less commercial, less material, and rather more in keeping with the spirit of the landing of the Pilgrim Fathers, whose glories are the chief attributes of our national greatness.

I want the committee to note one general error in history when the conduct of early New England is a matter of discussion: We usually speak of the persecution that was exercised in this part of the country, especially in Massachusetts, and we identify it with this particular Massachusetts settlement. That is not accurate. That is not historic. The persecution that caused a good many persons to leave the Massachusetts colony was not by the Pilgrims. The Massachusetts colony of 1628 was not identical with the Pilgrims of 1620. The persecution was by the Puritans, and the historian will not make the mistake of confusing the Pilgrim with the Puritan, although the latter term was generally applied to all the people who landed. However, they were two entirely different people. The Pilgrim, chiefly actuated by religious impulses, politically represented what later the Puritan furthered—a distinctive idea in government that has also a religious phase—and while we usually emphasize the religious impulse in the settlement of Plymouth, it had a far-reaching political meaning beyond any religious meaning. In fact, the significance is political rather than religious. It was in this colony where was started what has come to be our distinctive local government institutions, and which served as the training ground for our present system. These settlements were made as church congregations. That became a government of itself. By the side of the church stood the schoolhouse, and they were both built upon the public square. They were a part of the government that was to be, the town-meeting government, the value of which was not so much the importance of each suggestion of those in attendance, but that self-respect which went with the right to make the suggestion; and, fellow members of the committee, I hope you will emphasize in your minds that these church congregations are the genesis, the very first step, of what we are proud of to-day in our system of local self-government that has distinguished America beyond any other Government in the world. By the time of the Federal Convention we had a body of citizens trained in self-government. Here was a church congregation as the unit of government. It was presided over by the pastor, who was preacher and teacher and general adviser in the community. A combination of the church congregation formed the township to which the congregation was subordinate. A combination of the townships formed the county. In like manner the township was subject to the county. A combination of the counties formed the State and a combination of the States formed the Nation. As the church congregation was the unit and a part of the township, it was subordinate to the township, the township being superior to the church congregation. So the township was subordinate to the county, and the county was subordinate to the State, and the State was subordinate to the Nation. Here was the natural and logical growth of the constitutional supremacy idea of government so prominent in our past history.

Consequently this constitutional idea that makes the national prerogative superior in all matters pertaining to all the Nation grew as naturally from the local government of Massachusetts, started by the Pilgrim fathers, as any plant grows in the garden under proper cultivation. There were two fundamental wings of government in America—one begun at Plymouth, which flowered into the theory of government most prominently set out by Daniel Webster in his debates in the Senate, and the other at Jamestown, most prominently dignified by State rights, as set out by Hayne and Calhoun in the Senate. State rights developed into a specific idea in government just as naturally as was developed in New England the former theory. The State rights theory grew on parallel lines with the one developed from the settlement of the Pilgrims. In the Southland climate and soil invited the larger estate—the plantation system—which did not give the township system. Instead, the county became the unit of representation. Likewise the State developed less subordination to the Nation, and State rights, rather than constitutional supremacy, became the ruling theory of that part of the country. These two theories—one on Plymouth Rock, the other in Jamestown—ultimately became Nation wide. They spread westward along parallel lines. The early persecution in Massachusetts acted as a stimulus to spread the Puritan idea of government. Roger Williams went to Providence to establish the Colony of Rhode Island on the principle of freedom of conscience; Hooker went to Hartford for greater religious freedom; while Davenport went to New Haven to establish his religious government, with the Bible as his constitution. Through this difference on these matters, the theory of government was thus extended over a wide field, that in time covered much of the northern section of the country.

On the other hand, the southern country, whose soil favored cotton growing, which invited the big plantation, also made profitable slave labor. This peculiar domestic institution thus became identified with cotton growing, and localized in the South, demanded State rights as a protection against Federal interference with slavery.

It is an interesting study in politics and government to note how tenacious these ideas have been until recently. To-day the State rights are not confined to the South, neither is constitutional supremacy theory confined to the North. There never has been a time when the centralizing influence of the Government was so strong as under the present administration, although its chief support is found in the South, the section where State rights grew normally.

The two plantings were wide in their meanings. Jamestown was celebrated in 1907. Plymouth we propose to celebrate this year, or rather in 1921. It is well for our people to do this, as no nation can afford to lose touch with its beginnings.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on this resolution.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the preamble.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the preamble. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, at what point is it proper to make a motion to strike out the preamble?

Mr. WALSH. After it has been ordered to a third reading and before it is read the third time.

Mr. GARD. I think the preamble should be stricken out; it has no place in the bill.

Mr. WALSH. It is not in order to strike it out until after it has been ordered to a third reading.

Mr. GARD. I understand that; but what I was asking was if there is to be any action toward striking it out.

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it resolved, etc., That there is hereby established a commission to be known as the United States Pilgrim tercentenary commission (hereinafter referred to as the commission) and to be composed of nine commissioners, as follows: Three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States; four Senators by the President of the Senate; and four Representatives by the Speaker of the House of Representatives. The commissioners shall serve without compensation and shall select a chairman from among their number.

The following committee amendment was read.

Page 3, line 7, strike out the word "two" and insert the word "four."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Chairman, I move to further amend, in line 6, by striking out the word "nine" and inserting the word "eleven," to make it correspond.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. LUCE: Page 3, line 6, strike out the word "nine" and insert the word "eleven."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I want to call the attention of those who have charge of the bill to what certainly would be better language in section 1 in this respect. In line 8 it says "and four Representatives" are to be appointed. It seems to me that this would be better expressed, in legislative language, to say four Members of the House of Representatives. I submit that for the consideration of gentlemen in charge of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the official title or designation of Members of the House is Representative in Congress, notwithstanding he is very often referred to as a Congressman. This language follows some other resolutions that have been adopted in appointing commissions, but I have no objection if the gentleman desires to offer his amendment. I do not think the committee has any objection.

Mr. LUCE. The committee has no objection.

Mr. GARD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

Page 8, after the word "four," strike out the word "Representatives" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Members of the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 8, after the word "four" strike out the word "Representatives" and insert in lieu thereof "Members of the House of Representatives."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to proceed for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. WALSH. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman intend to speak on the bill?

Mr. HUDDLESTON. No.

Mr. BLANTON. Reserving the right to object, and ordinarily I would not object, but the gentleman from Alabama had seven minutes a little while ago. I would like to be heard on that proposition but we have not the time to-day. I only had two minutes while the gentleman had seven. He had permission to extend his remarks, and if he takes more time on that subject I want to answer him.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I do not wish to argue with the gentleman from Texas or to have any discussion with him. I have some views that I want to present to the House.

Mr. LUCE. I find it necessary, Mr. Chairman, to object.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman withhold his objection for a moment?

Mr. LUCE. Yes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I think that you will be saving time to give me a chance. We have plenty of time in front of us and it will save the time of the House. The gentleman realizes that it does save time. I have something important that I want to say. I am not speaking for my own pleasure.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. EDMONDS. Reserving the right to object, and I am not going to object, I want to say that to-day was set aside for the Private Calendar, and if there are any more requests made for time I am going to object.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. I am sure that the people of the country in considering what has just been said by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] must also consider the fact that in his home city of Birmingham, Ala., to-day the plumbers' organization, one of those that he has been defending on the floor here so zealously, is demanding of the public—not requesting or asking in the way of petition, but demanding by force of threatened strike, if you please—$12 a day. Not only that, but they are demanding that an automobile be furnished to carry them to and from their work. They do not stop there.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Not now. I have only 5 minutes and the gentleman has used 17. They demand not only that they be furnished automobiles, but they even stipulate that they must have a chauffeur who is not a plumber; a regular chauffeur to drive them to their work. In other words, they refuse to drive themselves. The gentleman from Birmingham, Ala., has forgotten to tell the people of this country that the loyal farmers during this same war took less than one-third for their wheat, the bread power of the country, less than one-third what they could have gotten in the open market. He has forgotten to tell the people of this country that the loyal woolgrowers took less during the war than one-third of what their wool would have brought in the open market. They took it because they were willing to sacrifice in order that our boys in the trenches of France could have warm clothes to cover their bodies.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am sorry I have not the time and can not yield, but I want to say that there is nothing on God's earth that will do more to produce socialists, anarchists, communists, and men who hate the flag than the kind of speech that the gentleman from Alabama has just made on the floor. [Applause.] I want to say that I am as good a friend to the man who labors as the gentleman from Birmingham. I want to say that I will go just as far to uplift the laboring man, because I am one myself, as the gentleman from Birmingham, but you can look at every word I have uttered since I have been in Congress and there is not a single word or a syllable or the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t" that will incite or tend to make a Bolshevist out of an American citizen. Every word I utter here is to inculcate and bring forth the very best that there is in Americanism. It puts Americanism first; it puts the principles of that flag there for which that Father of his Country fought to uphold, and his picture there on that wall should inspire us to put 100 per cent Americanism first before everything else, and I hope that the gentleman will keep that speech out of the RECORD. [Applause.]

The Clerk read, as follows:

SEC. 2 (a) That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the sum of $400,000, to be expended by the commission in accordance with the provisions of this resolution.

(b) One hundred thousand dollars of such appropriation may be expended under the direction of the commission and in cooperation with the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission, the town of Provincetown, Mass., and such other agencies, public or private, as the commission may determine, for the purpose of completing and improving the approaches to and the grounds of the Pilgrim Monument at Provincetown, Mass.; of erecting suitably inscribed tablets or markers in the towns of Provincetown, Truro, Wellfleet, and Eastham, and for other work in connection therewith, in accordance with plans adopted by the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission.

(c) Three hundred thousand dollars of such appropriation may be expended under the direction of the commission and in cooperation with the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, the town of Plymouth, Mass., and such other agencies, public or private, as the commission may determine, for the purpose of restoring and improving Plymouth Rock and the shore line of the locality adjacent thereto, of protecting and improving the burial grounds upon Coles Hill and Burial Hill in Plymouth, Mass.; of erecting tablets or markers at appropriate places in the Old Colony, and for other work in connection therewith, in accordance with plans adopted by the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that we have been endeavoring since the beginning of this Congress, and quite successfully, to carry out a program of economy in expenditure, some gentlemen have suggested the thought that the enactment of legislation of the character now under consideration and the making of appropriations along the line proposed are hardly in harmony with the policy we are endeavoring to follow. Mr. Chairman, there is nothing more important at any time than the practice of economy, proper and reasonable economy. There is nothing more absolutely essential than that at this particular juncture, and yet, Mr. Chairman, at all times there are questions that lie outside of, that are beyond and transcend even as important problems as those of economy in the expenditures of a people. There are certain events in the history of mankind that have so far-reaching an effect on peoples and their development that it is a matter of duty to have and keep those events in mind in order that we may profit by the lessons they teach. I am not of the blood of the Pilgrims. I grew up, however, in a family who were descended from some of those good folks who came over in the Mayflower, and I had the opportunity in my early youth to know of the virtues of those folks as exemplified in their descendants. In the early days of American history many ships touched our shores, bringing colonists and adventurers to one part of the country and another. Some of those ships and some of those voyagings and those who made the voyages have had a very great influence on American history and none a greater or more beneficial influence than the Pilgrims who came in the Mayflower. The influence of those good people, possessed of stern virtues, standing for honesty, right, and justice, has been an influence that, perhaps, transcends that of any like number of people who have landed on the shores of America. In view of that fact, even in a day when we are seeking to economize, we may well appropriate, as we propose to do, in order properly to celebrate, in order properly to express our appreciation of the very great value to America and to all the world of the influence for good that came with the Pilgrims in the Mayflower and that spread throughout the land and throughout the world from the Rock at Plymouth. [Applause.]

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a parliamentary inquiry as to recognition. Did the gentleman from Wyoming move to strike out anything?

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. Does the gentleman rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment?

Mr. GARD. I did not know there was any amendment at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call attention to section 2 of the bill in reference to securing a little additional information. Section 2 provides and authorizes an appropriation of $400,000 to be expended by a commission which is heretofore created in section 1 in accordance with the provisions of the resolution. Now, the provisions of the resolution as they appear in subdivisions B and C of section 2 are the commissions to Provincetown and Plymouth. My observation of commissions—and it has been rather limited owing to my limited service in the House of Representatives, but it has been coexistent with that—is that it is rather an expensive form of entertainment; so I would like to inquire whether this $400,000 is actually going down into Provincetown or Plymouth, as the resolution provides it should, or are we to have builded up here in the name of another commission a United States Pilgrims' tercentenary commission of nine persons, with possibly numerous adjuncts—secretaries, clerks, and stenographers—who will require or need amounts of money either to be given in addition to this or taken from the $400,000? That is the first point of my inquiry.

Mr. WALSH. Will the gentleman permit?

Mr. GARD. I should be very glad to yield to my friend.

Mr. WALSH. The gentleman is one of the best-versed legislators upon the side of the House which he graces with his ability and dignity [applause], and I think the gentleman appreciates the fact that when the Congress authorizes a committee or a commission or a board that unless authority is conferred to employ services or assistants or otherwise no such authority can be exercised when an appropriation is made. There is no such authority carried in this joint resolution. The money to be appropriated is to be expended under the jurisdiction of the commission in cooperation with the official commission of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts to carry out the program which has been officially adopted by the legislature of that State.

Mr. GARD. I understand the legislative position thoroughly, as the gentleman has stated it correctly. But this is the proposition: There never has been a commission created which did not find it necessary, either in the authority of its authorization or authority immediately subsequent thereto, to take on a personnel clerical organization. Now, I do not know what the gentleman has in mind, but if these nine men are organized as a commission for the purpose of acting with the local commission in Plymouth and Provincetown, in the State of Massachusetts, it will be most unusual if there is not brought here an additional authority for the expenditure of money in the employment of necessary clerical aid, and, for one, I do not see, if this commission is going to do any work at all, how they are going to escape some clerical assistance. How are they going to get along without a secretary? How are they going to carry on their correspondence without secretaries and clerks?

And all these things are necessary and should be embodied in the bill, because otherwise the commission is simply a created commission of nine men, none of whom will do any of the actual clerical work, as the gentleman well knows. It is not my idea to say that such an appropriation is wrong, because I think it is right and necessary, but my inquiry is as to how much of an additional appropriation will reasonably be thought necessary?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARRETT. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent for two additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARD. My inquiry is as to how much of an additional appropriation will reasonably be thought necessary to carry out the purposes for which the commission is created. In other words, the purpose of getting in communication and keeping in communication with these committees in Massachusetts, the purpose of giving the money, the purpose of adding their suggestions to the suggestions of the local committees—all of these things are a part of them. Another thing, in order for the commission to be there it will be necessary to have an additional appropriation to provide for the commission going to Massachusetts and for their maintenance while there and their travel. All these things enter into the life of every commission, and if this commission does not ask for it, it will be not only most unusual, but it will be most ineffective as a commission. Therefore I would ask the gentleman's advice upon these two points again, as to the necessity for clerical hire and necessity for travel and maintenance and appropriation on the part of the commission.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

In reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] I will state that eight members of this commission will be made up of Members of Congress and three members will be appointed by the President. And I will say that while I am here I should not favor making an appropriation for any personnel for the commission, such as secretaries and assistants. It may be possible that the commission might be authorized to have some money for traveling expenses, as the gentleman suggests. I think undoubtedly that it would be unfair to require the commission to attend the observances at Plymouth and Provincetown at their own expense, or to attend meetings there in connection with the carrying out of the program at their own expense, and, as far as that goes, the travel feature, I think the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio is very well put. But as to having secretaries and clerks, I do not believe that would be necessary, and, in fact, I would personally think that the members of the commission could very well get along without them, inasmuch as at least eight members of it are furnished with official secretaries and clerks in connection with their duties as Members of the Congress.

There was no provision carried in the bill for traveling expenses, perhaps through inadvertence, but chiefly because the recommendation of the joint special committee, which consisted of the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DOREMUS], the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. WHALEY], and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. MCARTHUR], and myself. We did not take that matter into consideration in making our recommendations, and the Committee on the Library did not have the matter brought to its attention.

Mr. BLACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BLACK. I notice in section 3 the following language:

> All expenditures of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission.

Would not it likely require some clerical assistance in the examination of these itemized vouchers? Does the gentleman expect the commissioners to do the examination required in order to determine whether these vouchers are proper or not, and so on?

Mr. WALSH. I would expect them to do so; yes, sir; because the eight members will be Members of Congress, and I would think that they would be perfectly competent to attend to such clerical work as is necessary without cumbering up this commission with clerical assistants.

Mr. WELLING. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. WELLING. It seems to me that section 3 provides that the clerical assistants—in fact, any agency, officer, or employee, as set up in the bill and provided—shall be paid by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts and not by the Government of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. No. That is in cooperation with those agencies.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. OLIVER. Would the gentleman from Massachusetts object to an amendment seeking to limit the amount that could be expended for clerical work or the expenses of the commission?

Mr. WALSH. I would not object, but under this language they could not expend a cent for clerical work.

Mr. OLIVER. I think that would be an implied authority.

Mr. WALSH. It is not an implied authority. If the gentleman will just recollect, when Congress creates any agency to expend its funds, unless the express authority is given for the employment or the establishment of a personnel, they can not set it up; and in case they do, they would find that it would not get by the comptroller.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. OLIVER. This resolution confers upon the commission authority to do certain things, and in the doing of those things it will be found necessary to employ parties not only to keep accounts but to perform the certain work they are directed to do, and unquestionably they will have implied authority to employ parties to do that work, and clerical assistance is certainly incidental to the work they are required to do.

Mr. WALSH. Does the gentleman appreciate the fact that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has an official commission with employees and clerks, which is to have charge of this, and that this commission will simply cooperate with that commission, and that the clerical work, if it is necessary, will be performed by the commissioners of the Commonwealth and referred to this commission directly for approval and signature?

Mr. OLIVER. I think that that is the contemplation of the gentleman from Massachusetts, and may be the course pursued by the commission. But under this resolution, as the gentleman stated in reply to a question a few minutes ago, it will certainly be necessary to employ clerical assistance, which may be charged to this fund.

Mr. WALSH. That would have to come out of a lump-sum appropriation, and I would not be in favor of making that available.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment. On page 3, line 14, I move to strike out the figures "$400,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$420,000," with the additional language following "of which $400,000 is."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. GARD: Page 3, line 14, strike out the figures "$400,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$420,000, of which $400,000 is."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, the purpose of this amendment is to have the attention of the committee called to two questions which I think are very serious in the life and activities of this commission. One is that I believe that it is absolutely necessary to have some clerical organization. If you have eight Members of Congress, you have eight clerks and none of them will do any of the work. You have to have a central organization for the commission. The other idea is for a travel and maintenance allowance of the commission. They should be cared for. In fixing the amount at $20,000, I think I am fixing the amount very reasonably, both for clerical work and for the maintenance and traveling expenses of the commission; and I do it because if we fix it at $420,000 and then provide that $400,000 of it goes to these two towns for the purposes of the resolution, then the $20,000 may be used for clerical hire, help hire, and for maintenance and traveling allowance by this commission of nine commissioners; and surely that would be an ample allowance for the commissioners and an ample allowance for the clerical help.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will be glad to yield.

Mr. DOWELL. There is no provision, however, for the expenditure of this money for that purpose. First is the question whether or not the commission may legally spend it for clerical hire. Has not the comptroller ruled that unless there is a specific provision for the allowance for clerical hire it will not be paid? And should not the gentleman's amendment be followed by another amendment to make an appropriation for the expenditure of the $20,000?

Mr. GARD. I have no objection to that. But the fact I was endeavoring to get before the committee is that now is the time to establish what this commission is to be allowed, rather than come in two months or four months or six months from now, because these commissions grow apace with the days and weeks and months, and when we create a little commission with no personnel in a few months we find we have a large commission with an enormous personnel. It may be and probably is that the gentleman's contention is correct, that the amendment should be made more specific by itself, or that there should be a supplemental amendment offered. But when we find on our hands a large commission with an enormous personnel we are then called upon for divers and various and sundry appropriations, so that if we consider the matter now among ourselves and determine what amount is necessary for clerical hire—because some amount will be necessary—I think we are doing that which we should do at this time.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will be glad to.

Mr. FESS. I think there can be no objection to $400,000 for the purpose; but does not the gentleman think that there is objection to expressly stating that $20,000 is to be paid for clerical and traveling expenses for the purpose of this celebration? I think that is rather offensive.

Mr. GARD. Why? There must be something paid. These men will not go themselves, and their clerks will not do the work.

Mr. FESS. There is nothing of that sort; and more than that, this is a cooperative arrangement between the Government of the United States and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will pay the expenses. That is the idea that the committee acted upon.

Mr. GARD. It is the gentleman's idea that there will not be any clerical help hired here, and that there will not be any appropriation for traveling and maintenance of the commission?

Mr. FESS. That is my idea; yes.

Mr. GARD. Well, that may be the gentleman's idea, and it may be that it is right. I myself do not think so. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] said but a moment ago that he thought some provision for traveling and maintenance allowance ought to be made. I do, too, because I think when we create a commission of the dignity which this commission will have we ought to provide it with maintenance and traveling expenses.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield again?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. FESS. This is simply an appropriation of $400,000.

Mr. GARD. An authorization.

Mr. FESS. Yes; I mean an authorization. Our committee did not have the power to appropriate. It is not to employ a great clerical force. The money is to be expended under the requirements of the resolution here, and we are not going to create a great group or organization here that will step over and take over the work that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is going to do.

Mr. GARD. No; but when you expend $400,000——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] will not be agreed to. The bill carries authority to appropriate $400,000, and as the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has said, it is a large amount of money for these times. I agree with him that the cause is good, and that the Congress is justified in authorizing the appropriation. It is for a worthy purpose. But it is a lot of money, and the $400,000 is enough. It is all that is asked for, and the gentlemen from Massachusetts themselves tell us there will be no expense such as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] wishes to take care of. Let us take them at their word. It is always good. We do not need the extra $20,000. Four hundred thousand dollars under these circumstances at this time for this purpose is enough. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, some think this is a good deal of money to spend just now, but my impression is that people who do not have respect for their ancestors will not receive much respect from their descendants. I am very glad that the House takes the attitude that it takes, that even though it may be a good deal of money to expend, this thing itself is one of such importance in the annals of this country that now when it has come up, if it were not favorably acted upon it would show on the part of Congress that the people are lacking in respect for those whose example started a new world into action, and I think none of us are guilty of that.

Of course, I may be accused of speaking from the personal standpoint, because I learned the other day that I am a descendent of John Alden myself. So I rise to speak as one of those descendants, and on behalf of those people I wish to express our appreciation for your action. It is true we had a hard time getting over here, a struggle against great difficulties, but we made it and here you are.

Looking over the genealogy of the Waldo family of northeastern Connecticut, because Olive Waldo married David Taylor and was the mother of my mother's father, I found David and Olive were married at North Mansfield, Conn., in 1790, and I have seen the record of their marriage there at the old church half a mile or so from my great-grandfather Taylor's farm, and now on the grounds of the Connecticut Agricultural College. Waldo was the third or fourth in descent from John Waldo, who fought against King Philip at Quaboag, for which fight he got $20 and I think it was worth it.

One of the intervening Waldos married a Miss Alden of the Mayflower stock. So I naturally feel that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is really our representative here, and I owe it to him to stand by him in this request. When I visited Plymouth a few months ago the first man I met and talked with was a Standish, a direct descendent of Capt. Miles Standish. The present Standish is engaged in the moving-picture business and is doing very well, he tells me. So I guess Miles made a good move when he came over and established a family there. My grandfather's great-grandfather, Jonathan Taylor, fought at Louisburg and David at Bunker Hill with the Connecticut troops.

My wife's first ancestor, John Steele, was the first member of the general court from Cambridge, Mass., and was the founder of Hartford, Conn. Her family furnished the boy who "beat up the tune of Yankee Doodle at the Battle of Bunker Hill," as he later testified when they tried to court-martial some of the officers. Col. Moses Little commanded the only troops that reinforced Prescott on Bunker Hill after the fight started, and won a promotion there. This is a good deal of money, but you can see, gentlemen, that I am simply compelled to stand by our representative, Mr. WALSH. And by the way, I have a further commission. John Alden, about the twelfth direct descendant from John and Priscilla, is a student in the high school of Kansas City, Kans., now, and we expect to have him at the celebration and I want it done right. A curious illustration of the growth and development of America, and of the fact that it has been a haven of liberty for those from all the world, is the fact that while this boy is a direct descendant of this historic Pilgrim father, his mother is the daughter of Russian parents, her father having led a great colony of Russians who settled in central Kansas, where he added greatly to the ample competence he appears to have brought with him. Another illustration of the splendid achievements of the American institutions is the fact that both parents of this John Alden are graduates of the University of Kansas. So you see, gentlemen, that the cords which run from Plymouth Rock tinkle a bell that knocks at the heart of every American settlement, and colony, and State, and county, and town. This is perhaps more true of Kansas than any other State, for it is the direct descendant of the sons of Plymouth Rock. That State was the pivot on which liberty turned when its early settlers undertook to dedicate it to human freedom and establish forever on the prairies the principles for which those men and women stood at Plymouth 300 years ago. Those Kansans

> Crossed the prairie as of old
> Their fathers crossed the sea,
> To make the West as they the East
> The homestead of the free.

Kansas carried the Plymouth Rock to the plains and established its culture and its freedom in the great West. Sometimes her name was cried in the roar of battle when the Nation was shaken to its foundation stones. Sometimes that name was called in derision, the State that was the storm center of new thought that startled men grown old in ancient ways. Sometimes men viewed in astonished admiration the wealth that was piled up in her granaries and now gushes from the oil wells deep in her soil. And now I notice that when you go to the theater the play writers begin to crown her with the flowers of romance and to make of Kansas the enchanted land where the simpler life and the higher life and the life of adventure and of romance find their natural domicile. This new Kansas will be glad to help celebrate the anniversary of their first ancestors on this continent, by whose principles Kansas has ever stood—

> For she failed you not in the early day,
> And she failed you not in the late,
> Nor forgot you how the balance was poised on our youngest State,
> Nor how with the fate of Kansas was linked the Nation's fate.

How could any man have a prouder boast of honored ancestry than a string of generations of farmers and fighters, the first of whom landed at Plymouth Rock 300 years ago, and the last of whom to come fought with Dan Morgan's Virginia Brigade and Carvel Hall's Maryland Regiment in almost every battle from Saratoga to the Cowpens, and the last of whom lies buried in the soil of the most typically American of all the States.

So as the most obscure and unworthy of all the sons of that mighty breed, on behalf of the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers, I venture this appreciation of your attitude. In view of the hard time that we had coming over and the immense good we have done this country, I want to thank the House for its appreciation of the achievements of our people. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the Pilgrim Fathers came to America to escape injustice. They fled from persecution. I have no doubt that they were called by the stupid, false, and selfish of that time the seventeenth-century equivalents of "reds," "radicals," and "bolshevists," and such other epithets of that kind as were in use. They were nonconformists. They did not conform to dominant opinion. It is a penalty that people always have to pay who do not conform—first, persecution; second, misrepresentation; and third, vilification.

Many people in this world even now are stupid enough to believe, as there were people stupid enough to think then, that rebels against established churches and princes—communists, socialists, and other noncomformists—are made by words. They think that if you speak some forbidden words to a man it makes a wild-eyed radical out of him. The idea of people of that stage of stupidity is that if you could just stop folks from talking all would be well. I can not deal with that kind of brain; I can not carry on any debate based on that kind of a theory. I am not willing to cast the little pearl or two I have in any such endeavor.

Now we have unrest in this country. We have a great deal of economic and industrial unrest. We have very little political unrest. But this industrial and economic unrest may be converted into political unrest by political measures which make men feel that they are being persecuted.

I have not the time now to say more than this: Communists are not made by words; socialists are not made by words. They are made by the overpowering eloquence of situations, of injustice, and of persecution.

No doubt the great employing interests of this country think they are doing the right thing. They think that to strong-arm the workingman and drive him into his corner will make him submit, and that he will go back and be just as docile as he used to be in the old times before he got so enlightened. But I would like to express in my modest, apologetic sort of way the thought that the people who are making Bolsheviks in this country are those who oppress others. It is the profiteers, it is the exploiters, it is those who grind the face of labor, it is those who make the men who work feel that they are being treated with injustice.

And I want to say again in my modest and apologetic way that the head of the Steel Corporation, in my judgment, did more to provoke discontent in the United States than all agitators in it put together could possibly do when he stood in the President's industrial conference and refused to agree to a measure which would have made for peace and harmony between the workers and their employers.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Alabama.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN I do not usually agree with the gentleman from Alabama, and therefore I want to oppose this amendment.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The gentleman flatters me.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, as this is to be an educational proposition, I hope, as well as one doing honor to those great people who came here under the circumstances that they did, I have a matter here that I wish to call to the attention of the House. I have here a report of a meeting that was held in Dallas, Tex., some days ago, headed "Freedom of speech is urged in forum."

I do not think there is anybody in the United States worthy of calling himself a citizen who does not believe in freedom of speech; but I rise to call attention to something that appears in this article, and I call the attention not only of the House but of the Bureau of Education to the author of this statement. I find that one Dr. Henry E. Jackson, of Washington, D. C., head of the Division of Community Organization of the United States Bureau of Education, spoke in Dallas on that occasion before what was known as the Dallas Open Forum. Most of his address was devoted to what he conceived to be freedom of speech. After his address was completed he submitted himself to questions, and one of the questions propounded to him was as follows:

> Should Eugene V. Debs be in prison or not?

Dr. Jackson answered in these words:

> It is a sad indication of the hysteria and unnecessary fear when a man like Debs, who is a gentleman, and who embodies the teachings of Jesus as Debs has done, is confined to prison. It is a thing which should humiliate us all.

Now, my friends, if we want the minds of the youth of America poisoned, we can allow them to take their inspiration from a poisoned source. If the Bureau of Education, in seeking to carry out the purposes for which it was formed, can not find better men than a man who will make a speech like that, then the law creating it ought to be repealed. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask for two minutes additional.

SEVERAL MEMBERS. Take five minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I ask for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FESS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Can the gentleman give me the initials of Dr. Jackson?

Mr. RAYBURN. Dr. Henry E. Jackson.

Mr. FESS. Is the gentleman sure that he is connected with the Bureau of Education here?

Mr. RAYBURN. A newspaper man called me this morning and told me that he had seen him yesterday; that he does have this connection with the Bureau of Education; and that he still justifies the statement reported of his remarks at Dallas.

Mr. FESS. I had some doubt as to whether a man who would make such a statement as that would be retained by the Bureau of Education, and this is what is in my mind: Some years ago, as my colleague will remember, we had a number of people connected with the Bureau of Education, and other bureaus, who had only a nominal attachment, and who were supported by funds contributed by other sources, and we found that those men were propagandists, going around the country expressing their peculiar views on the single tax. I remember a group who were supported by a fund. I think my friend will remember that. They have been detached, as I understand. Now, I do not know Dr. Jackson.

Mr. RAYBURN. This meeting was held not more than two or three weeks ago, and it is reported in a paper that is always reliable—the Dallas News—and it makes this statement:

The address was delivered by Dr. Henry E. Jackson, of Washington, D. C., head of the Division of Community Organization, United States Bureau of Education.

Mr. FESS. If the gentleman will permit me, I appreciate what he says. I sympathize wholly with his angle, and what distresses me more than anything else is that there is more of that sort of rot found in the colleges of the country to-day, and in the universities, than is found elsewhere. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. I quite agree with the gentleman.

Mr. FESS. If it has gotten into our Bureau of Education, there ought to be a renovation of that bureau.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know nothing about this except what appeared in that newspaper article; but I say if there is a man in the employ of the United States Government, and especially in the Bureau of Education, who entertains such ideas as this, and who holds the Government of the United States and its laws up to ridicule and disfavor like this, he should not only be dismissed, but he should be kicked out of the bureau. [Applause.]

Mr. BLACK. Will my colleague yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. BLACK. Speaking of Debs, it might be well to know that Debs has openly announced that he is in thorough sympathy with the bolshevists.

Mr. RAYBURN. And I think that Dr. Jackson is, too.

Mr. BLANTON. Two of a kind.

Mr. MacCRATE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I came in just as the gentleman from Alabama was making some reference to the Pilgrims and what might have been said of them, and stated the terms now used concerning the "reds," the bolshevists, and the communists may have been applied to the Pilgrims.

I do not favor the repression of speech, but I think most of the men who now complain of the lack of freedom of speech are men whose vocabulary is limited; they say anything they please, and had they greater power of speech they would say more.

But that is not the purpose for which I rose. I saw an article where a minister said that the people who sailed back on the Buford in December last were real descendants of the people who came over in the Mayflower. Any man who has read the compact of government written in the cabin of the Mayflower on November 11 before the Pilgrims landed knows, if he knows anything, that there is a gap as wide as that between heaven and hell between the men who came over on the Mayflower and the men who sailed away on the Buford. [Applause.] The men who came over in the Mayflower were conscience controlled, and the people who went back on the Buford knew nothing of the control of conscience. [Applause.] The men who came in the Mayflower regarded labor as divinely given to man, and the people who went back on the Buford despise labor, but seek to live on the honest labor of others. [Applause.]

In explanation of why they adopted the compact of government in the cabin of the Mayflower, Bradford says: "Because of the mutterings of some strangers among us we did form this compact of government."

In the very beginning of our history, before even we had conceived of a national existence, the men who came here realized that government is impossible without obedience to law [applause], and these men before they landed on American shores said it is not possible for everybody to do anything he will, at any time he will, but as free men declared deliberately then and there that they would be governed by law. [Applause.] And when the bolshevists, the communists, and extremists of all kinds declare a willingness to abide by the Constitution and laws of the country they will take the first step to place themselves in the same category as the men who landed on the shores of New England. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the House, I had not intended to say a word on the passage of this resolution, but as one Member from Massachusetts I felt so very much pleased with the eloquent and spontaneous speeches made in behalf of the resolution by Members of this House from different parts of the country that I could not allow this opportunity to pass without expressing my appreciation.

After listening to the speeches just made I know of no better time for the people of the United States to rise and again teach the lessons of patriotic devotion to country than by passing a resolution like this by which we pay tribute to the Pilgrims who came here and laid the foundation of this great country of ours that we all so much love.

I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that as I read the history of the landing of the Pilgrims at Plymouth and read of their sufferings and sacrifices, knowing as I do the shores of Massachusetts, I can say that the sufferings they endured from the severe northeast weather and from a sea as dangerous and treacherous as any on our shores were not in vain.

The sufferings they endured served to unite them more strongly than ever and urged them on to attain the purpose of their mission here.

We in Massachusetts are proud of the blessings that have been handed down to us in the history of our State. Every man loves his State and its history, and we, of course, love ours. The people of Massachusetts have always tried to keep alive in the memory and minds not only of the citizens of Massachusetts and of the country, but of those who come to our shores, what is meant by patriotism, what is meant by love of country. Close to where Plymouth Rock stands there has stood for many years a monument erected by the people of Massachusetts, on which are inscribed the names of the Pilgrims and the story of their journey, standing high on a lofty hill that overlooks the bay, so that he who comes to our shores may ask the question, "What does it mean?" "What does it stand for?" and can be told.

Only last Monday in our State we celebrated another patriotic event—"the Battle of Lexington." The State has set aside this day, the 19th day of April, as a legal holiday, to be celebrated in honor of this event, and we call it Patriots' Day. On that day every year we call the attention of the world to the history and story of Lexington and of Concord. On the 17th of June each year we celebrate another day. We celebrate the anniversary of the Battle of Bunker Hill, a battle that has gone down in history as an example of the bravery of the patriots of that day, for whom although they suffered a defeat it was in reality a victory that meant more to them than anything up to that time, for it showed their pluck and courage and that they were not afraid to fight and die for their cause.

By these celebrations and many others we have tried to keep these historical events alive. We have marked the spots with monuments and memorials. We have tried to keep alive the love of country, the love of the flag, and teach the young as they grow up what it means to be a stalwart, earnest American. We want to teach the alien that without oppression, without trying to deprive him of his rights, this country has conferred upon him a wonderful privilege; that our institutions, free as they are, are open to him to enjoy them; that he can go into these institutions and by living up to the teachings of the Government can make of himself and those who follow him the same standard of American citizen that prompted the Pilgrims to come here and seek their independence and their liberty and their freedom. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] was speaking, I called up over the telephone the Bureau of Education. I am informed by that bureau that Dr. Henry D. Jackson is regularly employed there, that he receives $10 per day, not to exceed $2,500 per annum, and that he has taken the oath of office the same as all others connected with that bureau.

Mr. BLANTON. Then he ought to be kicked out to-day.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Chairman, as a son of Massachusetts who has spent all of his life in the old Bay State, I join with my colleague who has just spoken in grateful appreciation of the tribute which has been paid to the early founders of the old Plymouth Colony by Members on both sides of the aisle. What has been said in this hour has made us who represent that Commonwealth here in the House of Representatives more proud than ever before that we come from Massachusetts, and more proud than ever before of our membership in this body. It is hardly necessary for any member of the Massachusetts delegation to rise to advocate the passage of this resolution when one reads even casually the splendid report which a Massachusetts Member of the House [Mr. LUCE], a member now of the Committee on the Library, has written in presenting the resolution to this body.

In referring to my colleague's classic, the thought occurs to me that, unfortunately and unhappily, too many of the reports which accompany resolutions and bills are never read by anybody anywhere. For that reason I want to read here and now a few extracts from Mr. LUCE's language for your intellectual enjoyment and for the benefit of those elsewhere who read the daily reports of our doings here in Congress as they are set forth in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I quote Mr. LUCE:

This resolution contemplates that the Nation shall play a fitting part in the commemoration of an epoch-making voyage.

Three hundred years ago a small company of devout men and women, upheld by conscience and inspired by faith, braved the dangers of the sea in order that in a new world they might found a Christian commonwealth.

They landed first at the end of Cape Cod, where now is Provincetown. There in the cabin of the Mayflower they signed a compact that has taken its place among the momentous documents of history, for then Englishmen first joined by mutual covenant to form a civil body politic. Because this was the germ of the idea that was to grow into the Constitution of the United States every American owes gratitude to its authors and should honor the spot where it was conceived.

The search for a permanent abiding place ended with crossing the bay, December 21, to a harbor that was henceforward to be forever famous as the scene of the landing of the Pilgrims. There they reached the soil of their new home by setting foot on a bowlder to be known wherever the English language should be spoken as Plymouth Rock.

"The landing of the Pilgrims" symbolizes one of the world's great adventures. The hardships of the voyage, the perils of the wilderness, the ravages of that dreadful winter—these are but circumstances that frame the picture. Acting for the Nation, our concern to-day with the solemn story is that it rivets the imagination on the noblest phases of human nature—lofty purpose, dauntless courage, steadfast endurance, pious enthusiasm, holy faith.

To commemorate and glorify these virtues, out of which sprang the most precious institutions of America, is not only to inspire our people with fresh gratitude for their heritage but also to revive their respect for those institutions, spread understanding of what they mean, insure their safety, encourage their growth. Never has it been more important for us to teach the lesson of liberty through law, of sacrifice for common gain, of righteousness for its own sake.

We do not often in our doings here have the opportunity for the inspiration which prompted the lines I have just read, and yet it occurs to me that the resolution now before the House will revive your recollections of the story of the Pilgrims. It is an old, old story that you read in your childhood and that you have read over again in your maturing years. Historians have ofttimes narrated it; orators have made it the theme of their eloquence; artists have illustrated it; and poets have immortalized it in their song. Familiar as the narrative is our attention can not be directed to it too often. It should not be permitted to remain stored up in the silent chambers of forgetfulness, covered with the dust of years. It should be brought forth and brushed up, so that by contemplating it repeatedly we shall learn its many lessons and feel the thrill of its grand inspiration.

May I recall the beautiful words of John Boyle O'Reilly in his sweet poetic tribute to the Pilgrim Fathers?

In every land wherever might holds sway
The Pilgrims' leaven is at work to-day.
The Mayflower's cabin was the chosen womb
Of light predestined for the nations' gloom.
God grant that those who tend the sacred flame
May worthy prove of their forefathers' name.

More light has come—more dangers, too, perplex;
New prides, new greeds, our high condition vex.
The fathers fled from feudal lords and made
A freehold State; may we not retrograde
To lucre lords and hierarchs of trade.
May we, as they did, teach in court and school
There must be classes, but no class shall rule.

[Applause.]

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentlemen from Ohio asks unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto be now closed. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That no expenditure shall be made or authorized by the commission until the Commonwealth of Massachusetts has, as determined by the commission, expended or contracted to expend the sum of $300,000 for the same purposes for which the commission may under the provisions of this resolution make expenditures. The United States shall not be held liable for any cost, expense, obligation, or indebtedness on account of the maintenance or upkeep of any property in respect to which any expenditure is made by the commission under the provisions of this resolution, nor for any obligation or indebtedness incurred by the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, the Provincetown Tercentenary Commission, the Pilgrim Tercentenary Commission, or any other agency or officer, employee, or agent thereof, for any purpose for which the commission may under the provisions of this resolution make expenditures. All expenditures of the commission shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the commission, but no expenditure shall be made or authorized by the commission except with the approval of a majority of the commissioners.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, on line 25, page 4, the figures "$300,000" and insert the figures "$400,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 4, line 25, strike out "$300,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$400,000."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, at the risk of appearing ungracious, without the slightest desire so to do, I am led to make certain observations concerning the resolution which I think will make for its betterment. I am sure that everyone will join in the thought that this patriotic spectacle is one which will be of immediate and lasting benefit to the people of the State, not alone where the celebration is held, and of those contiguous to it, but to all of the people of the United States. Therefore I am of those who believe that it is right, eminently fit, and proper, to have the United States join with the State in making the appropriations where the State and the United States jointly receive benefits, either immediate or remote. In this instance the report which is written by one of the gentlemen from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] recites:

The contribution of the State of Massachusetts, already $275,000 in amount, and expected to be increased to $425,000, with whatever Congress gives, will be used wholly (barring small administrative expenses) for permanent improvement.

It seems to me that when the United States takes up with a State, as it does here, the matter of affording $400,000 of the money of the United States, it is only a fitting response from the State which receives the great immediate benefit to make an equal appropriation. Therefore I think it would be entirely the desire of the great State of Massachusetts to have it known that in this celebration, the principal features of which will be carried on at Provincetown and Plymouth, all within the limits of the old Bay State, it contributes at least as much toward the celebration as the Government of the United States of America. It is sometimes said that we are invading State rights, but for one I fear that the States very frequently seek to divest themselves of responsibilities, and in this instance I do not think the people of Massachusetts seek to divest themselves——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I must object to all of the time being taken up this afternoon by this discussion, when the afternoon is supposed to be devoted to a consideration of the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman can object, if he wants to, to my being granted an additional minute. I do not care.

Mr. EDMONDS. I withdraw my objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one minute.

Mr. GARD. I just wanted to complete the thought by saying that I think it would be eminently fair to the State of Massachusetts and to the people of the United States as well if there were equal contributions by the General Government and the State of Massachusetts.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Chairman, I might say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] that the appropriation by the State of Massachusetts has already been made, and it was found by the joint special committee that looked into these matters of all these historical celebrations that have heretofore been had and observed that the Federal appropriation always was many times larger than that of the particular State where the observance was held. We have appropriated for expositions and world's fairs at various points in the country many times more than the appropriations of the States. We have appropriated millions when the State in which the particular fair or exposition was held appropriated only up in the hundreds of thousands.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Now, if we impose this additional requirement of an appropriation for Massachusetts it will require another act of their legislature and will probably require a rearrangement of the program already made.

Mr. GARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. WALSH. Yes.

Mr. GARD. I was led to offer the amendment I did because the report says that it is expected to be increased to $425,000.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; there has been——

Mr. GARD. If that be true, what is the objection to putting in $400,000 now?

Mr. WALSH. Because the recommendation of the governor might not be favorably acted upon by the legislature. The State of Massachusetts, I would say, has made an appropriation of $275,000 for Plymouth and $50,000 for Provincetown. Now, as the gentleman well knows, the State of Massachusetts has been under very heavy obligations on account of the war. It has paid a bonus to her soldiers of $100. It has contributed very liberally toward the dependents of those soldiers, and it might be that the legislature would feel that where the program has been already officially adopted it would not be wise to increase the appropriation, and I think that in view of the fact that the joint special committee has seen fit to recommend only $50,000 more than the Commonwealth did in each particular instance that the limit fixed is sufficiently large. I hope the gentleman will not insist upon his amendment. Ordinarily I would say it might be a wise thing to insist upon equal contributions, but while the immediate benefit may go to the two localities, still the localities there are visited by people from all over the country and the lessons to be derived do not apply simply to Plymouth, Provincetown, and Massachusetts, but we hope to make this a shrine for the people of America and also visitors from other lands to our shores. I hope the amendment of the gentleman will not be agreed to.

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, much that is really beautiful, not only patriotic but even going beyond that, has been said here to-day about Massachusetts and of the Pilgrims and the early settlement of Virginia, and it calls to mind the inspiring and the thrilling story by Goldwin Smith of the colonial settlements. How remarkable it has all been that there could be gathered together in America from all quarters of the globe every tongue in creation, every custom, every religion, and ultimately the assimilation and amalgamation of it into a positive, cohesive force that stands together challenging the world to-day for liberty and human rights. [Applause.] That was brought about through one definite purpose. These Pilgrims as well as the Quakers and those who settled Virginia and Delaware and North Carolina had one thing in mind, and it was not only religion, because there was nothing said about religion in the Declaration of Independence nor in the Constitution. For 5,000 years men and women had wept and suffered and bled, countless thousands of men and women have died for that one thing, the most cherished emotions of the heart and soul—human liberty as we have it here and now enjoy it. Now I might tell, as equally applicable as that which has been said in regard to the Puritans, of what was done in the settlement of Pennsylvania by William Penn and his sons, and how they bought the land from the Indians and honestly paid for this land and whose titles are traced back to that time and held valid under the laws of the Great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania. But we pass that for to-day and dedicate this an hour of honor for Massachusetts. But let me submit something, gentlemen, since there is so much digression, that really applies to an important prevailing situation. I will ask the Clerk to read here a letter you will all be interested in.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read in the gentleman's time.

The Clerk read as follows:

LEWISBURG, PA., April 21, 1920.

Hon. B. K. FOCHT.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: A short time ago I noticed a statement in the papers that the Grain Corporation, whose official life comes to a close the last of May, asks for an extension of time to enable it to dispose of its enormous stocks of flour and wheat. Since the farmers in general have sold their wheat and received the guaranteed price and more, they can not be benefited or hurt by any further action by the Grain Corporation on this crop. Consequently the one to be taken care of is the man that has to pay for the bread, and he can be helped to a slight degree if the Grain Corporation is compelled to sell all its wheat direct to millers and prohibited from turning it into the hands of speculators, grain dealers, elevator companies, or such concerns as could force the price to exorbitant figures. Limit the sale entirely to legitimate millers at the same price at which the Grain Corporation paid for the wheat plus storage, if necessary. Keep it out of the hands of exporters also, and let Europe buy our flour. Then our own people will be taken care of; all our mills will be running, so that the dairymen may have plenty of mill feeds at lower prices than at present. This in itself would have a tendency to keep down the prices of milk, butter, and cheese, and make us think that our Government was trying to do something real to help keep living expenses from advancing.

Can't you work this up among your friends and associates? The people need some relief, and I think this is a good place to start it.

Yours, very truly, WALTER MCCRACKEN.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FOCHT. I believe the House fully realizes the pertinency and force of the letter, and I therefore ask that I may have the consent of the House to extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That the Postmaster General is hereby authorized and directed to issue a special series of postage stamps, in such denominations and of such design as he may determine, commemorative of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for this porpose: Section 4 provides for the issuing of a special series of postage stamps without any designation as to the amount. It provides that they shall be issued in such denominations and such designs as may be determined by the Postmaster General. It seems to me that the amount should be likewise left in the discretion of the Postmaster General, as the amount, denomination, and design are all properly within the functions of the Postmaster General. Also it would seem to me that section 4 should be included in the operation of section 5, because clearly after December 31, 1921, there would be no use for the continued issue of a special series of postage stamps commemorative of this event. Section 5 provides that only sections 1 and 2 of this resolution, which are the appropriation sections, shall expire on December 31, 1921, and unless these curative amendments are offered we have, under section 4, the idea of the Postmaster General being authorized to issue a special series of stamps without regard to amount and without regard to time the stamps shall be issued. I submit the observation to those in charge of the bill. There being no observation in reply I offer an amendment. In line 20, page 5, after the word "such," insert the word "amount."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 5, line 20, after the word "such," insert the word "amount."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask leave to revise and extend my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kansas? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 1 and 2 of this resolution shall expire December 31, 1921.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD: Page 5, line 24; strike out the word "and" after the figure "1," insert a comma after the figure "1," and after the figure "2" insert the word and figure "and 4," so that as amended it will read:

"SEC. 5. That the provisions of sections 1, 2, and 4 of this resolution shall expire December 31, 1921."

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, we have no objection to that.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise and report the resolution to the House with amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LEHLBACH, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration House joint resolution 302, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the resolution as amended do pass.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution and amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment? If not, the Chair will put them en gross.

The amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. LUCE. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the preamble.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The question is on the third reading of the resolution.

The resolution was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the resolution.

The question was taken, and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. BLACK and Mr. GARD demanded a division.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 59, noes 5.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. LUCE, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MERRITT & CHAPMAN DERRICK & WRECKING CO.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the bill H. R. 9629 be taken from the Speaker's table. This bill has been passed by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania calls up the bill H. R. 9629, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

An act (H. R. 9629) for the relief of the Merritt & Chapman Derrick & Wrecking Co.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the Senate amendment striking out section 2 of the bill. This bill gives damages out of the Treasury of the United States, and it has been stricken out by the Senate. I move that the House concur in that amendment.

Mr. GARD. May we have the bill reported in full and as amended, so that we can understand what the amendment is?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the claim of the owner of the derrick Concord, arising out of collision between said derrick and the U. S. S. Robin on January 10, 1919, at the north pier of the Merritt & Chapman Derrick & Wrecking Co.'s dock at the district salvage base, Stapleton, Staten Island, N. Y., for and on account of the losses alleged to have been suffered in said collision by the owner of said derrick Concord by reason of damages to said derrick, may be submitted to the United States court for the eastern district of New York under and in compliance with the rules of said court sitting as a court of admiralty; and that the said court shall have jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole controversy and to enter a judgment or decree for the amount of the legal damages sustained by reason of said collision, if any shall be found to be due either for or against the United States, upon the same principle and measure of liability, with costs, as in like cases in admiralty between private parties, with the same right of appeal: Provided, That such notice of the suit shall be given to the Attorney General of the United States as may be provided by order of the said court, and it shall be the duty of the Attorney General to cause the United States attorney in such district to appear and defend for the United States: Provided further, That said suit shall be brought and commenced within four months of the date of the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. That should damages be found to be due from the United States to the owner of said derrick Concord, the amount of the final decree or decrees therefor shall be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The Senate amendment was read as follows:

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the Senate amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. GALLIVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on House joint resolution 302.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. WALSH). The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks on House joint resolution 302. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

THE PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the balance of the day was set aside for bills on the Private Calendar. I ask that the bills on the Private Calendar be taken up and considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state that the announcement that has been made by the Speaker is to the effect that when unobjected bills on the Private Calendar are in order, they are considered in the House as in the Committee of the Whole without a special order. The Clerk will report the first bill.

JOHN A. GAULEY.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2396) for the relief of John A. Gauley.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, the bill (H. R. 2396) for the relief of John A. Gauley, has been before the Congress for a number of years, for injuries sustained as long ago as December, 1907—something over 12 years ago. The bill when it was on the Calendar the last time was passed by request of the chairman. I desire to make the inquiry of those who speak for the committee concerning the merits of this particular bill with respect to any liability on the part of the United States. The report shows that this man was injured whilst in the act of oiling some of the gearing upon some machinery at the arsenal; that he had stepped upon a box; that, his duty being to oil certain parts of the machinery, when he stepped on the box he placed his hand upon a part of the gear that was not guarded. There was no necessity for the man placing his hand there, but he did that. The report of those who were immediately by at the time show, as I read the evidence, that there would be no liability in negligence on the part of the United States. I desire to call the attention to that idea, so that the gentleman may inform the committee of just what his investigation of the evidence has shown.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARD] will read the first page of the report in this case, he will find that the committee found—and I want to state that this bill first came before the House with the unanimous report from the Committee on Claims in the Sixty-second Congress, about nine years ago—if the gentleman will read the first page of the report, I repeat, he will find that the Committee on Claims found at that time that the machinery where John Gauley was working at the time of the injury was not properly guarded. And I wish also to state to the gentleman that from the investigation that I made, from the investigation that former Congressman Mitchell, now collector of internal revenue for the State of Massachusetts, made, and from the investigation that was made by former Congressman Peters, afterwards Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and now mayor of Boston, it was plainly evident that this was a case which, in our opinion, as members of the Massachusetts bar, would have been a case which, if this man had been employed by a private corporation, would have gone to the jury. Previous to the passage of the Federal compensation act by Congress there was, of course, no recovery possible in a case of this kind except by a special bill.

I desire also to say to the gentleman from Ohio that bills of similar character to this have been passed by Congress. Now, the War Department makes the statement at the present time that this man was hurt so many years ago—the injury occurring in 1907—that for that reason, and other reasons, it does not think that there is any merit in the claim. I want to say to the House that just as soon as possible after the accident occurred the matter was brought to the attention of the Congressman from the district. As the gentleman knows, it takes a long time to get the necessary affidavits. Any of the Members of the House who have had bills before the Committee on Claims knows that it takes a long time before one gets to the point where the committee is sufficiently convinced to bring in a favorable report. That is what happened in this case. There was no negligence on the part of this man or his friends. The reason why this bill has never passed, although it was recommended unanimously by the Committee on Claims in four successive Congresses, is because there has been no opportunity to bring the matter up except by unanimous consent, and there has always been some one who has objected to its consideration.

I sincerely trust that no Member will object to the consideration of this bill to-day and that this man will get relief. In regard to this claim Gen. Crozier, who was in charge of the Ordnance Department at the time, made the statement that $1,200 was not an unfair amount for Gauley to receive, and I hope that now, after all these years of waiting, this bill may pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill?

Mr. GARD. Still further reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to object and will not object to this man getting some compensation, but still I insist that there is no legal liability on the part of the United States.

Mr. DALLINGER. That is perfectly true, for the reason that this accident happened before the passage of the Federal employees' compensation act.

Mr. GARD. The gentleman does not contend that there is.

Mr. DALLINGER. I have tried to make it clear that until Congress passed the Federal employees' compensation act—under which this man, if this accident happened to-day, would be able to recover compensation—there was no legal liability against the Government of the United States in cases of this kind. Furthermore, I have already stated that in the opinion of three Members of Congress who are members of the legal profession, who looked into the matter, this would have been a case where, if the accident had happened in a factory belonging to a private corporation, the injured man could have gone into a court of law and recovered damages for the injury.

Mr. GARD. It is shown by the Chief of Ordnance that the gear was in plain view, and it was thought if he had exercised due caution the accident would not have occurred. Of course, the gentleman understands that in a damage case that is one of the elements of negligence. The jury could determine from the nature of the machine and the conduct of Gauley whether or not he had contributed by any negligence to his injury. But I never was keen about a strict adherence to the doctrine of contributory negligence unless gross negligence is shown. I am willing to see men paid who get hurt on machines, because I think they should be paid. A number of cases like this have been recognized. They are all recognized now under the conditions of the workmen's compensation act, which is a very good and helpful act. But so far as we have gone in cases like this we have paid, in cases of this kind, a year's compensation to the man who was injured, based upon a certain rate.

I trust that the gentleman will understand that when I even suggest this I do not do so in the interest of economy or cutting down a righteous claim. I suggest it only in the interest of fairness, considering the bills that have previously been enacted along the same line, and I make that suggestion now. The record shows that Mr. Gauley at that time was receiving $1.76 a day. The report also shows on page 1 that had he been allowed to remain in employment he would have received $2.72 per day. I make the suggestion to the gentleman, based on our previous action in regard to other bills of this kind and the idea that Congress previously had of paying a year's compensation, that possibly it would be well in the consideration of this bill, following the line of uniformity, to provide payment to Mr. Gauley for 365 days, the number of days in a year, at the rate of $2.72 per day.

Mr. DALLINGER. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GARD. Very well.

Mr. DALLINGER. Do I understand the gentleman to say that one year's compensation at the rate received at the time of the injury has been the basis for private bills in the case of permanent injury?

Mr. GARD. Yes. That has been the rule, where they do not come within the compensation act and there is no legal liability; and there is no liability here. It is a question of affording Mr. Gauley something for the injury he received. I am one of those who believe that cases of this kind ought to be cared for, and yet I contend that we should have some uniformity of approach in cases where there is no legal liability. There should be one standard, and the standard we have already adopted is the payment of a year's compensation. So far as I am concerned, I am willing to say that the man should be compensated, not at the old rate of $1.76 a day, but I am willing to see that he receives compensation at the rate of $2.72 for every day in the year, because I think this is an unfortunate case. The man is injured in his ability to make a living, and I would be willing as one Member of the House alone to accede to that proposition. I only suggest it, not to limit the recovery lower than $1,200. Of course, it does limit it; but I do not suggest it for that reason, but I do so because of the uniformity we have had heretofore in regard to other bills of this kind.

Mr. DALLINGER. Would the gentleman object to making it $1,000?

Mr. GARD. No; I would not object to it. I did not figure out what it is.

Mr. DALLINGER. It should also be understood that $2 a day then was equal to $4 now. I mean to say that if you want to come anywhere near compensating this man, I do not think you would do it by accepting the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio as the basis of calculation.

Mr. GARD. But this would give him the difference between $2.72 and $1.76.

Mr. DALLINGER. The gentleman knows that a dollar would then buy much more than it would now.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I understand this man was injured in December, 1907, and that he continued in his position, receiving the same compensation that he received at the time of his injury, for quite a period of time.

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes; after he came out of the hospital.

Mr. PARRISH. And thereafter he received additional compensation ranging up to $2.72, and he was receiving that at the time he resigned in August, 1919, last year. Is not that true?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. Then, as I understand it, this man has not suffered any injury or pecuniary loss but has continued in the service of the Government continuously from the time he was injured until last August. Therefore it seems to me that if any additional compensation is due him, it would necessarily be based on the rate that he was receiving and did receive for such a long period of time.

I would like to ask, if I may, while I am on my feet, this question of the gentleman from Massachusetts: How does it happen that there are two reports here? I notice that a report is made on August 1, 1919, on this bill, and I also notice that another report is made on October 8, 1919. The first report recommends favorable consideration of the bill, and the second report does not make any recommendation. Can the gentleman give us any information on that?

Mr. DALLINGER. I understand from the chairman of the Committee on Claims that the committee desired the House to have all the facts, and did not desire to conceal anything. It is a fact, as I stated in my opening remarks, that the present War Department is not in favor of this claim, and one of the reasons it gives is that this man was injured back in 1907, and now it is 1920.

It further contends that the claim does not have merit, but the fact appears in the report of the committee, and has appeared in the reports of the Committee on Claims in other Congresses, that Gen. Crozier, who at the time this matter happened was at the head of the Ordnance Bureau in charge of the Watertown Arsenal—who, by the way, never had the reputation of being an easy man in his dealings with Government employees—thoroughly investigated the matter, and repeated that he thought that $1,200 was a fair compensation, considering that the man was permanently injured by having had his fingers caught in this machine.

The officials of the War Department who have made the last investigation, on the basis of which the last report from the department is made—which report has not affected the action of the committee—do not know anything about the actual circumstances of the case. The accident occurred years ago. They were not there at the time, and I submit to the House that where the head of the Ordnance Department, who himself had been commandant of the Watertown Arsenal and who knew all the facts of the case, made a report that in his opinion $1,200 was a fair amount for this man to get, the House should be guided, as the Committee on Claims has been guided, by that recommendation from some one who knew about it, rather than by the opinion of some present official in the War Department who never knew John Gauley, or anything about his work, or anything connected with the case.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. PARRISH. I notice that the report from Gen. William Crozier, dated December 13, 1913, says:

> Although this employee does not appear to have any legal claim for compensation for injuries received, this office is inclined, however, to take a more liberal view of the matter, and it is thought that he should receive some compensation for the decreased serviceability of his hand in the other uses which he has for it in addition to earning his living with it. It is therefore thought that the $1,200 carried by the inclosed bill is not too great for the injury received.

That was six years ago. Has he made any recent recommendation?

Mr. DALLINGER. He is not connected with the Watertown Arsenal now.

Mr. PARRISH. This is the last we have on that from him?

Mr. DALLINGER. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. Gen. Crozier is not connected with the department now.

Mr. GARD. Still reserving the right to object, if the gentleman will himself offer an amendment, to be based upon the idea that I suggested, I am willing to withdraw my objection. If this man worked 365 days in a year, and worked every day, his wages at $2.72 would be $992. I am willing to adopt the gentleman's suggestion and make it $1,000. I have no desire to deprive him of the $1,200, because I would like to see him get more than that; but I do this in order to be consistent with other cases.

Mr. DALLINGER. If the gentleman will withdraw his objection to the present consideration of the bill, I will offer such an amendment.

Mr. GARD. Yes; I will withdraw it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John A. Gauley, of Arlington, Mass., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,200, and said sum is hereby appropriated as compensation for personal injuries suffered by said Gauley in the course of his duties as an employee of the War Department at the Watertown Arsenal, Watertown, Mass.

Mr. DALLINGER. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill in line 6 by striking out "$1,200" and inserting in place thereof "$1,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Massachusetts offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Amendment by Mr. DALLINGER: Page 1, line 6, strike out "$1,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for a division, just to check up. I am with the gentleman on his bill.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 0.

Accordingly the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMONDS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

MAJ. GEN. ENOCH H. CROWDER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2867) to authorize the President, when Maj. Gen. Crowder retires, to place him on the retired list of the Army as a lieutenant general.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. I object.

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I object.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentlemen withhold their objections two minutes?

Mr. STRONG of Kansas. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. RUCKER. I will reserve my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RUCKER. I object. It is not based on his rulings in court-martial cases, either.

Mr. GARD. Should not these bills which are objected to be stricken from the calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman is in error. A bill on the Private Calendar retains its place on the calendar.

HEIRS OF LEWIS J. BLAIR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3791) to pay to the heirs of Lewis J. Blair, late lieutenant colonel of the Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry, amount found due him by the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I object.

Mr. HICKEY. Will the gentleman reserve his objection?

Mr. GARD. I will reserve the right to object.

Mr. HICKEY. Mr. Speaker, this bill has been pending for some time. It was referred to the Court of Claims and a finding made by that court. I wish to direct attention to the finding of the Court of Claims, especially the first, second, and third finding of facts.

It will be seen by these findings that this officer performed the services of a lieutenant colonel; that under the statute in force at that time the governor of the State of Indiana had the right to appoint him to this place; that he did appoint him; and that he rendered the service and is entitled to the amount asked for, which is the amount mentioned in this bill. I am sure the gentleman from Ohio does not want to defeat what is honestly due an officer who served as this man served during the war, and I sincerely hope he will not object to the consideration of this bill.

Mr. GARD. This was one of the incomplete commands, of which there were a number, where certain commissions were sought to be issued but never did issue, because there was no place to issue them.

Mr. BEE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HICKEY. I will.

Mr. BEE. Did the Court of Claims find the amount?

Mr. HICKEY. No; the second finding of the Court of Claims was—

On October 30, 1863, the said Lewis J. Blair was major of Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry. On that date and until he was mustered out of the service, to wit, on June 14, 1865, the same was and continued to be below the minimum number prescribed by General Order No. 182 of the War Department of June 20, 1863, carrying into effect section 20 of the act of Congress approved March 3, 1863 (12 Stat. L., p. 734).

The lieutenant colonel of said Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry being then and thereafter out of service in said grade, the duties of lieutenant colonel devolved upon this claimant, who then and thereafter assumed and performed all the duties of lieutenant colonel of said Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The governor of the State of Indiana also issued to this claimant a commission as lieutenant colonel, Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry.

The finding, No. 3, is as follows:

On the said October 30, 1863, the mustering officer then and thereafter refused to muster this claimant as lieutenant colonel of said Eighty-eighth Regiment Indiana Volunteer Infantry solely because his command was below its minimum strength, as aforesaid, although he continued to perform the duties of lieutenant colonel until he was mustered out of the service as major, June 14, 1865.

This man rendered the service and filed his claim in the regular way. It has been under consideration a long time; it is a just claim; it is as just as would be the claim of the gentleman from Ohio to his salary as a Member of this House, and I say that the claim ought to be paid.

Mr. GARD. My reading of the evidence shows that this man acted as a major and got the pay and allowances of a major, and the report made as late as 1919 shows that nothing has been found of record in the office of The Adjutant General that he was mustered into the office, or that he performed the duty of the grade, or was recognized by the military authorities as a lieutenant colonel prior to his discharge from the service. As a matter of fact, there was no place that he could get to as lieutenant colonel because it was an incomplete command and there was no necessity for a lieutenant colonel. Therefore I object.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN OFFICERS OF THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2448) for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, does this bill carry all the different provisions that were recommended in the Committee on Claims, including the Graham case, captain of Infantry?

Mr. CRAGO. If the gentleman will permit, in the case of Capt. Graham there was a misconception in regard to it the other day when the bill was called up. The bill was not prepared and the Graham case inserted in it with any purpose of overriding the President's veto of the private bill passed through both Houses for the relief of Capt. Graham. I think they were placed on the calendar practically at the same time. The bill was acted upon and reported out favorably by the Military Committee before definite action was taken on the private bill introduced for Maj. Graham. It was done, thinking that the omnibus bill would receive consideration first.

Now, rather than have an objection to the bill I would agree to an amendment leaving Maj. Graham out of it, although I would prefer to have the bill passed as it is.

Mr. GARD. I do not have any particular objection to the Graham item, except as I recall when the matter was up before there was a discussion about the Graham bill which was passed by the House and the Senate and which was vetoed by the President, and on the presidential veto there has been no action by the House save the action of referring it to the committee.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say that the Military Committee did not feel at liberty, or did not feel disposed, to bring the bill back with any recommendation that it be passed over the President's veto.

Mr. GARD. I want my position to be thoroughly understood, that if the Graham bill has merit in it, it should be submitted to the House as an affirmative proposition rather than be included in an omnibus bill. Therefore, if the Military Committee think that Graham should be restored to the rank provided in the bill which the Senate and the House passed, it seems to me the proper procedure would be to bring it out so as to test it in the House.

Mr. CRAGO. I would have no objection, because I think new facts might be developed on a rehearing.

I will say that if the bill is considered at this time I will not object to a motion eliminating the case of Maj. Graham if it meets the approval of the House.

Mr. GARD. There was also some question as to section 1 of the bill.

Mr. CRAGO. That is for the English officer, Capt. Barber.

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say that this is a case where an English officer was detailed in the beginning of the war as an expert instructor for our troops. That during some firing there was an explosion of some kind, and this man was rendered totally blind. He has no means of support, except the small pay allowed him as a disabled officer of the English Army. Rather than have him on our pay roll on the retired list as one of our officers who would be similarly disabled, we fixed this at a lump sum so that when we made the payment it would be in full of every obligation of this country in a pecuniary way for the care of this officer. Both the subcommittee and the full committee thought this was a better policy than it would be to have him on the list for compensation through all the years that he might live.

It is a very small sum, considering the sacrifice that the man made. It was early in the war, when we were needing such men.

Mr. GARD. There is no question that the man received serious injury?

Mr. CRAGO. He is totally blind.

Mr. GARD. And he received the injury while assisting in the training of troops. This is the situation, however: He was a member of an army of one of our allies at the time he was injured, and since he has been receiving compensation as provided by the laws of the country to which he belongs.

Mr. CRAGO. That is true, but the man is a married man and is dependent on the small pay which he gets as a disabled officer of the English Army. I will say that that pay is very small compared even with the pay that we give our officers.

Mr. GARD. Would there be any objection on the part of the British Government to our taking action of this kind in this particular case? While I recognize the merits of the particular case, I do not want to go too far without having a word from those who represent the executive branches of America and of England, whether a policy of this kind is thought to be desirable. In other words, if an American officer is injured in England and is incapacitated, either wholly, as this man is, or partly, is there any policy agreed upon and carried out by which the American officer would receive, in addition to his American compensation, a grant of money from the English Government? I want to be fair to the English soldier, but I want to be eminently fair also to the American soldier.

Mr. CRAGO. Mr. Speaker, if any case of that kind has occurred, it has not been brought to the attention of our committee. I doubt if such a case has occurred. We were too short of officers to be furnishing officers for the training of English troops, and, if the gentleman will notice the communication from the Acting Judge Advocate General, some objection was made along that line to the granting of an annuity, the placing of the man on the retired list, or giving him a yearly sum, and for that reason we thought it was a better policy for us to give this man what would be considered fair compensation had he received this injury in some accident in civil life, and have it wiped off our books as far as the financial side of the matter is concerned. We believe that to be the better policy.

Mr. GARD. Is there any recognition of this by the War Department, in so far as a recommendation is concerned?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes; the recommendation is from the Surgeon General of the Army, who knows about the matter.

Mr. GARD. Is there any recommendation from the Judge Advocate General of the Army?

Mr. CRAGO. The Judge Advocate General's recommendation is on page 3 of the report, and the recommendation of the Secretary of War will be found on the fourth page of the report, and in that I call the attention of the gentleman to the following language:

> I am told that Lieut. Barber is a married man, dependent upon his pay as a soldier, and that his disability pay under the army regulations of Great Britain would not be large. I earnestly recommend the passage of this bill, not only as a graceful act of international courtesy but as an act of justice to this excellent officer who has become disabled in our military service.

The Secretary accompanied that letter with a memorandum of the facts concerning the accident, which were laid before the committee. We felt that we should do something, and it was a question of policy as to what we should recommend. Finally, we unanimously recommended a lump-sum appropriation.

Mr. GARD. Instead of the participation in the benefits of any of the war-risk insurance acts?

Mr. CRAGO. Of course, we had no way of placing him under the benefits of the war-risk insurance act.

Mr. GARD. Except by special bill.

Mr. CRAGO. We could by special bill, or we could have placed him on the retired list of our Army.

Mr. GARD. This, of course, is a special bill in itself, which appropriates this lump sum?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes. This came to us in the way of paying him an annuity.

Mr. GARD. What was the amount of the annuity?

Mr. CRAGO. I see by reference to the bill that it was an attempt to make him subject to the provisions of the war-risk act. That was the bill which we considered. Rather than put an officer of the English Army in that class of persons, we thought it better to give him a lump-sum appropriation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I presume the gentleman will offer his amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, still reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is, Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Does the gentleman say there has been any different finding by the War Department in regard to the Graham case?

Mr. CRAGO. I am led to believe that there is a difference of opinion there from what there was when the veto was recommended; but I suggest to the gentleman that rather than have any objection made to this——

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Pennsylvania yield?

Mr. CRAGO. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I will state to the gentleman from Ohio—and he will probably remember—that I objected to this case coming up on the last private bill day. After my objection was made I was informed that the former stand taken by the War Department, which led to the veto of this former Graham bill which passed both the House and the Senate, is at this time withdrawn.

Mr. GARD. That is what I have been trying to find out.

Mr. BLANTON. That led me to withdraw my opposition to it, and under the circumstances I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not object.

Mr. GARD. I am not objecting. I am putting it up to the chairman of this committee.

Mr. CRAGO. Nothing has come to us officially about that case.

Mr. BLANTON. And nothing has come to me officially, except what has come to the gentleman. The same information has come to me.

Mr. CRAGO. Information has been given that this is not now objectionable. Whether that is true or not I do not know.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman will state that it is not now objectionable, I will state that I have no inclination to object to the case of Maj. Graham. On the other hand, if the gentleman wants to eliminate him, I simply offer this as a suggestion, that the bill be so amended.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that I do not believe the bill will meet with objection if it goes to the War Department.

Mr. BLANTON. We have this safeguard if the War Department has any objection to it. There is still time to assert it, and it might be again vetoed.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that this bill will go to conference, and I am frank to say to the gentleman that if the objection of the War Department is not removed as to Maj. Graham we will endeavor to eliminate that provision in conference.

Mr. GARD. I would prefer to have the matter acted on directly. If the gentleman will state that he has official information that this Graham bill is not now objectionable to the War Department and the President, notwithstanding the previous veto, which, of course, was made on information obtained from the War Department, I would have no objection, but it would seem to me to be better to leave out the case of Maj. Graham.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that I can not say to him that I have official knowledge of anything of that kind. I am told by Maj. Graham that had the facts all been known at that time the recommendation would not have been made, and if the gentleman will recall, this is not a matter of putting a man back into the Army——

Mr. GARD. I know it is a question of restoring him to his grade.

Mr. CRAGO. That is all it is, and I would be very frank to say to the gentleman that rather than have this bill go to the President with that provision in it, if that objection is not removed, I would prefer to take it out in conference.

Mr. GARD. I think we would better take it out now.

Mr. CRAGO. I would prefer that it go through as it is.

Mr. GARD. Better take it out now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to pay, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Frank Barber, a first lieutenant of the Dorset Regiment of Infantry of the British Army, who lost the sight of both eyes and became totally blind by reason of a premature explosion on February 14, 1918, while acting as an instructor of the United States troops at Camp Wheeler, Ga., as compensation for disability resulting therefrom, such sums of money as by the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department,' approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes," approved October 6, 1917, is provided to be paid as compensation for disability to an injured person who has lost both eyes or become totally blind from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States; and such compensation shall be payable and be paid as of and from the 14th day of February, 1918, and under and according to the terms, conditions, and basis of computation in said act provided, and such sum shall be in full of all claims, legal or equitable, of the said Frank Barber, his heirs, representatives, or assigns.

SEC. 2. Col. William A. Simpson: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, Col. William A. Simpson, United States Army, retired, to the position and rank of brigadier general on the retired list.

SEC. 3. Maj. H. W. Daley: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the consent of the Senate, Maj. H. W. Daley, National Army, to the position and rank of major on the retired list.

SEC. 4. Capt. Daniel W. Hand: That the name of Daniel W. Hand, now captain of Field Artillery, be placed on the lineal list of officers of Field Artillery in the position it would have occupied if he had not suffered the loss of rank announced in General Orders, No. 156, War Department, August 8, 1910; and the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint Capt. Hand, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to the grade which such restored position on the lineal list requires, to be an additional number in the grade until absorbed and no longer.

SEC. 5. Capt. Leonard F. Matlack: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Capt. Leonard F. Matlack, now serving with the Eighth Cavalry, to the position and rank of captain on the retired list.

SEC. 6. Credit in the accounts of Col. Jesse McI. Carter: The accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to allow and credit in the accounts of Col. Jesse McI. Carter, Cavalry, United States Army, the sum of $352.23, disallowed against him on the books of the Treasury.

SEC. 7. Capt. J. C. Garrett: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, J. C. Garrett, formerly a captain of Cavalry, to take rank as if he had remained continuously in the service.

SEC. 8. Col. Samuel R. Jones: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, Col. Samuel R. Jones, United States Army, retired, to the position and rank of brigadier general on the retired list.

The committee amendments were read, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, after the word "therefrom," strike out "such sums of money as by the act entitled 'An act to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes,' approved October 6, 1917, is provided to be paid as compensation for disability to an injured person who has lost both eyes or become totally blind from causes occurring in the line of duty in the service of the United States; and such compensation shall be payable and be paid as of and from the 14th day of February, 1918, and under and according to the terms, conditions, and basis of computation in said act provided," and insert in lieu thereof "the sum of $5,000."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 2, line 14, strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

SEC. 2. That Col. Robert H. Peck, Eleventh Infantry, Regular Army, who, under the authority of the act approved July 12, 1912, was, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, appointed a captain of Infantry, United States Army, to take rank at the foot of the list of captains of Infantry, be, and he hereby is, restored to the position on the lineal list of majors of Infantry of the Regular Army which he would have held had he not been out of the service; that is to say, to a place on the lineal list of majors of Infantry just above that occupied by Maj. H. E. Yates. But nothing in this act contained shall entitle the said Robert H. Peck to back pay or allowances.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 3, line 7, strike out the word "Daley" and insert the word "Daly."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Same amendment, line 10, page 3.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 3, line 11, strike out the word "Major" and insert in lieu thereof the words "First Lieutenant."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 4, line 4, strike out all of section 6 and insert in lieu thereof:

"That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to permit the reenlistment in the United States Army, at the grade held by him at the time of his dishonorable discharge from the service, of Omer Germain Paquet, formerly a quartermaster sergeant, and the said Omer Germain Paquet shall, for the purpose of computing continuous service, for ascertaining the rate at which he shall be paid, and for retirement, be considered to have served continuously from the date of his last enlistment."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Page 4, line 15, strike out all of sections 7 and 8 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 7. That in view of the conspicuous service in the Battle of Chateau-Thierry of John Elmer Wright, second lieutenant, Third Trench Mortar Battery, Third Division, United States Army, he having commanded a unit greater than the unit corresponding with his rank, and by reason of the serious wound he received in this engagement in line of duty, the President be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, the said John Elmer Wright to the rank of first lieutenant and to grant him a commission in accordance with such rank: Provided, That immediately thereafter the said John Elmer Wright be placed on the retired list of the Army as a first lieutenant, with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer of that grade.

"SEC. 8. That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to restore Harry Graham, captain of Infantry, to his former position on the lineal list of captains of Infantry immediately below that of Capt. John Randolph.

"SEC. 9. That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, William Shelby Barriger, who enlisted in the Regular Army on September 15, 1900, and who rose to be a first lieutenant of Cavalry, at present temporary major of Quartermaster Department, a captain of Cavalry, to take rank at the foot of the regular list of captains of Cavalry: Provided, That no back pay or allowances shall accrue as a result of the passage of this act: Provided further, That the total number of captains of Cavalry is increased by one for the purpose of this act."

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, what is the final judgment of the committee now in reference to this Graham bill, as to whether it shall be included or not? We are up to it now.

Mr. CRAGO. Well, the gentleman did not understand that I was going to make the motion to exclude him from the bill. I said if the House, acting as the committee, thinks it better to leave him out, all right. Otherwise we will leave it as it is.

Mr. GARD. I understand the position of the gentleman is that he wants somebody else to make a motion to strike out.

Mr. CRAGO. No; I would like to have the bill passed, if the gentleman pleases, just as it is. That is what we want and that is what we have recommended. We still think that we are perfectly safe in going to conference on this bill and there ascertain if the objection to Graham has been removed.

Mr. GARD. It would seem to me to have been the better policy in regard to Graham's reinstatement, which is a very delicate matter, and I dislike to stand in the way of a man getting the position he is entitled to after the great service of Capt. Graham; but, on the other hand, we are faced with the proposition that we once passed a bill for the relief of Graham and the President vetoed it after a strong letter from the War Department. Nothing since then has transpired to show that the veto was made under circumstances which were not fully understood and different conditions now prevail, so why include the Graham bill in here?

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that while I think something has occurred, and before this bill is finally passed we will know officially whether it has or not, we will not risk sending this bill to the President with the Graham provision in it unless the War Department has changed its attitude with regard to Graham, because we do not want to risk a disapproval of this bill. But I will say to the gentleman one item in this bill is to correct a mistake made just exactly like this by the War Department, where there is a reenlistment provided for.

Mr. GARD. But that did not go as far as a presidential veto.

Mr. CRAGO. It went as far as a dishonorable discharge from the Army, which meant as much to that man as this did to Graham.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask for recognition on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, this Graham matter formerly passed this House without a dissenting vote. It also passed the Senate without a dissenting vote. But when it went to the President he vetoed it on the recommendation of the Secretary of War. It is merely a question of restoring to his proper seniority one of the officers of our Army. The whole trouble arose in an examination that this officer was forced to undergo. The board of examiners in passing upon this examination made the report that this officer had cheated, and he was brought before a court-martial and dishonorably discharged from the Army. The only proof on God's earth that was produced against this officer was the mere statement by one of the board of examiners that the map which he had made in the examination was so correctly drawn that in their opinion it was impossible for a man to have made it unless he cheated. Now, the matter was submitted to the Military Affairs Committee of this House, which exonerated this officer and favorably reported the bill for passage. The matter was considered by the Committee on Military Affairs in the Senate, which exonerated this officer, and it favorably reported the bill; and we passed the bill and the Senate passed the bill, and when it went to the President and the Secretary of War recommended that the bill be vetoed, as before stated, the President vetoed it. Now, there is the parliamentary status of this bill. When this amendment was called up on the last Private Calendar day I objected to this bill upon the ground that there was already a veto message from the President on this bill undisposed of, and that we ought to vote on the veto message, which seems to have been sidetracked by some committee. But after preventing this bill coming up by my objection, I was forced by the information brought to me to conclude, because several parties spoke to me about it, that the War Department had withdrawn their objection in this case, and I am like the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania, who says he has no official knowledge. I have no official knowledge except seemingly reliable information that is brought to me.

Mr. ANTHONY. If the gentleman will permit, is it not also correct that the veto of the President was not upon the question of fact, but merely upon the objection which was made to putting him back in his original place in the lineal line?

Mr. BLANTON. That is exactly the fact. The President in his message to this Congress stated that he vetoed the bill upon a letter from the Secretary of War, and he did not even tell us what the letter was.

Mr. CALDWELL. The letter was that it would be unfair to the men who were on the list——

Mr. BLANTON. But the question now with us is whether it is not unfair to this officer not to restore him to his proper seniority and not let a lot of new fellows come in and be ahead of him.

Mr. CALDWELL. The gentleman is entirely right. I voted in favor of reporting this bill out of the committee. And I will say in addition to the things the gentleman has already said about it that this officer has served in the war in a higher capacity than he is now asking.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection and I hope this will pass.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. The question is on the committee amendment.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out the language included in section 8.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio offers an amendment to the committee amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GARD to the committee amendment: On page 5, line 19, strike out all of section 8.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the committee amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment to the committee amendment was rejected.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Amend the bill by inserting "Section 8 (a)" between lines 23 and 24, on page 5, as follows:

"SEC. 8 (a). Capt. J. C. Garrett: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, J. C. Garrett, formerly a captain of Cavalry, to take rank as if he had remained continuously in the service."

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the point of order on that. Do I understand the gentleman is now amending the committee amendment?

Mr. HUDSPETH. That is what I am attempting to do, or to put an amendment on the bill. I am not versed in parliamentary procedure.

Mr. TILSON. The gentleman is offering it right now in the middle of an amendment already adopted. I am speaking of the parliamentary side of it only.

Mr. CRAGO. I suggest that the gentleman had best offer it to section 10 of the bill.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, the committee amendment has been adopted, and if this amendment is offered at all it should be offered to section 10 of the bill.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I ask, Mr. Speaker, to so offer the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by substituting "section 10" for "section 10 (a)." Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HUDSPETH: Page 6, after line 9, insert a new section:

"SEC. 10. Capt. J. C. Garrett: That the President of the United States, in his discretion, be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, J. C. Garrett, formerly a captain of Cavalry, to take rank as if he had remained continuously in the service."

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I want to state to you that this bill, that I am offering now as an amendment, was passed by the Senate in the Sixty-fifth Congress and also by the present Senate.

The history of this case, briefly, is as follows: This officer, Capt. J. C. Garrett, was stationed at Fort Bliss, El Paso, Tex., and was in charge of the funds of Company A. He kept those funds part of the time in the bank and part of the time in his trunk, and he had $307, or about that amount, in his trunk that he intended to deposit in the bank, but on the day he intended to do so his company was called to the Big Bend, 200 miles distant. The Mexican commander at Ojinaga had been forced by Villa across the river into the State of Texas. Garrett's company was called there, and his trunk was shipped to Glen Springs, which was 100 miles farther on, where another raid had been made. I should have stated that he was expected to go to Glen Springs, but afterwards his company of Cavalry was called to the Big Bend, across from Presidio. This money remained in the trunk. Garrett went to the Big Bend in order to protect the lives of the Americans in that section. The money remained in his trunk that was shipped to Glen Springs for over two months. In the meantime Garrett was arrested for embezzling these funds. He refused to employ an attorney, and was sentenced to Leavenworth. The Secretary of War recommended that he be pardoned and restored to citizenship, and he was pardoned, and when his trunk was found at Glen Springs, under a mesquite tree, every dollar of the money was found in it; not a cent had been taken; but he was discharged from the Army. His history is that he is a young man from New York State, who enlisted in the Army at the age of 18, and in four years he was promoted to the rank of captain, and was personal bodyguard to Pershing when the general went into Mexico after Villa, and rendered valiant service by killing three insurrecto leaders down in Mexico. That is the history of this young man that they have attempted to disgrace.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Will the gentleman state what court he was tried by?

Mr. HUDSPETH. He was tried by court-martial at El Paso. He refused to employ an attorney and said that he was innocent. Every dollar of the money was found in his trunk.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas. Did he make a defense?

Mr. HUDSPETH. He did not make any defense at all, except that he pleaded not guilty, and said that the money was in the trunk. And they found every dollar of it. Yet this young man was discharged from the Army, his rank taken away from him that he had acquired in four years of splendid service in this country.

I believe, gentlemen, he ought to be restored to his former rank and reinstated in the Army. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call attention to the parliamentary procedure in regard to this matter, assuming that this is the same Capt. J. C. Garrett who was included in section 7, on page 4. Section 7, when the bill was read heretofore, was stricken out as a committee amendment, and the committee amendment was approved, as I recall.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that if the point of order had been made when the amendment was proposed it would have been sustained, but it is too late to raise a point of order now, the amendment having been offered and debated.

Mr. TILSON. Was it not also permitted to be inserted after section 9 by unanimous consent?

Mr. GARD. I do not make a point of order at all. I do not know anything about the merits of the case.

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that that is the same man who was mentioned in section 7 of the original bill. I do not recall exactly why the committee struck that out. It is rather a close question——

Mr. GARD. That is the trouble with a case of this kind. Here is a committee composed of able men——

Mr. CRAGO. I will say to the gentleman that, although it is almost six months since we considered this case, the testimony as recited by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], who introduced this amendment, is substantially the testimony that was before our committee at that time, and that it was stated that when the trunk of this man was found, the funds of which he is charged with being short were found in that trunk.

Mr. GARD. I do not know anything about the case. It may be exactly what the gentleman from Texas says it is. But what I am calling attention to is the fact that the committee is deliberately placing itself in a position where none of the bill can be sustained, because having stricken this out at one time and having that action approved, it now consents to having the same thing come in again.

Mr. CALDWELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. CALDWELL. I think I can explain why the item was stricken out. This case is covered by a bill that was passed twice by the Senate, and when we were considering the bill as it came before us we had no witnesses before us at that time. I presume we could have had them if we had taken the time to get them. We were trying to get this bill reported out.

Without passing upon the merits of the case, although in support of the bill there was filed a memorandum setting forth the facts substantially as stated by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH], as to which I do not think there is any doubt, because the Senate report carries practically the same facts, it was thought we would be safe in letting this case stay out of the bill unless some fight were made on the floor of the House, and if a fight were made it might be put back, and then if it were not when the bill went to conference no doubt a number of other such cases would be tacked on in conference, and it could then be considered in connection with them.

Mr. GARD. My idea is that, in fairness to the membership of the House, the Committee on Military Affairs having stricken this out after supposedly having heard the evidence, the committee should at least explain its action. Here is a case where a man makes no defense.

Mr. CALDWELL. I have plead guilty for the committee concerning that case. I think the matter was stricken out because we had not the evidence before us or the witnesses before us.

Mr. GARD. It makes a great deal of confusion.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Surely.

Mr. HUDSPETH. I will say to the gentleman from Ohio that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CRAGO] said he did not have this information and he would not oppose this if I should bring it up on the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HUDSPETH].

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CRAGO, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BLANCHE UTLEY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10317) for the relief of Blanche Utley.

The title of the bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Reserving the right to object, when this case was up before there was some controversy about it, largely in so far as it affected the extent of the injury and the amount of compensation, as I recall.

As I understand it this young girl was injured while occupying a lawful position on a public highway, the accident occurring by a Government airplane dragging a wire across her face. The case is one which appeals to me as a case which, in the absence of any other provision for payment, is proper for our consideration. Therefore I am not disposed to object to it, but I reserve the right to object for the purpose of having the gentleman from Texas inform the committee as to what the extent of the injury is. This bill carries an appropriation of $5,000, and the medical evidence is limited, I take it, as to the injury which was received and as to the permanency of the injury. Of course, if the injury is a permanent disfiguring of this young girl, $5,000 is an amount of money that will not compensate her. On the other hand, if it is an injury which can be remedied by medical science, then this sum may be too great.

In that connection I desire to say that the pertinent thing, it seems to me, is that there has never been any medical treatment of this girl except first-aid treatment of the whole family when they were scraped by this wire, for which $25 was paid.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I made the reservation of objection for the purpose of having the gentleman explain the bill.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say to the gentleman and to the other Members present that the injuries to this little girl are not only severe, but they are permanent. They are outlined on page 11 of the report of the committee in a statment made by the medical officer of the Army, Capt. Arthur J. Boyd, at the post hospital at Taliaferro Field, Hicks, Tex., June 21, 1918, after an examination made on the day of the injury, in which he says:

> Blanche Utley, age 7 years: Transverse wound across face, involving both sides of face, complete severance of nose to malar, incised wound from center of forehead to bridge of nose 2 inches long meeting wound running transversely across face, sutured. Skin wound on body, left side, region of last rib, superficial, 3 inches long, sutured. Multiple lacerations about right elbow.

Mr. GARD. There is no injury in that which would be permanent except the facial injury.

Mr. LANHAM. I have not completed my statement.

Mr. GARD. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. LANHAM. When I was in Texas in November I saw this little girl and had an opportunity to investigate the extent of her injuries. They are not altogether facial. She has great scars upon her arms and upon one of her hips. A fair idea of the facial injury is indicated by a photograph here, as well as it can be shown pictorially. She is disfigured for the remainder of her life. A report made by another Army medical officer on December 29, 1919, subsequent to this examination which I made of her, reads as follows, this examination being made by Lieut. Lewis H. Long, Medical Corps, on duty at Taliaferro Field:

> Examination of this case shows the following conditions: Scar extending from left malar across face laterally to a point over the masseter muscle on right cheek, the lachrymal duct of left eye has been destroyed and tears flow over the cheek, also the injury at this point has contracted the tissue and pulls the lower lid slightly downward. No impairment of health. An unsightly scar is the only defect outside of the two mentioned. It is my opinion the scar will be permanent.
> Find inclosed photograph of the claimant Blanche Utley, which was taken about November 22, 1919.

This second examination and report was made a year and a half after the injury.

Mr. GARD. Is this statement in the committee report?

Mr. LANHAM. No, sir; this is in a letter dated December 29, 1919, to the chairman of the Committee on Claims from Maj. Gen. Henry Jervey, Assistant Chief of Staff and Director of Operations.

I will say to the gentleman that there was not very much that could be done except simply to sew up this poor girl's face, which was not a very expensive operation. Investigations were made with the Johns Hopkins people in Baltimore, who have had considerable success, it seems, in what they call cosmetic surgery, trying to repair injuries of this character, and the report from there is to the effect that it is not likely that any material improvement of the girl's condition could be made by further cutting these scars and sewing them together.

Mr. GARD. Has the girl been taken to Johns Hopkins?

Mr. LANHAM. She has not. I will say to the gentleman that I personally talked about this matter to a very distinguished physician and surgeon of my own city of Fort Worth, who is a graduate of the Johns Hopkins University. I talked to him in Washington. He frequently visits the Johns Hopkins Hospital, and is familiar with the work done there in this respect, and he assured me that nothing could be done to relieve materially that condition.

Friends of the family took the matter up with the Johns Hopkins Hospital people, sent photographs of the girl, and received a letter from them saying that they could offer no hope of a material improvement in what they termed cosmetic surgery.

The little girl's nose on one side was completely severed and is attached at the cheek at an unsightly angle; the face is badly scarred on both sides. She was a beautiful child originally, as the pictures taken before the injury will show, and, as indicated by the later photographs, is now absolutely disfigured in her personal appearance for the remainder of her life. The doctors who have examined her say that the condition is permanent. In addition to that, the inquiry made by myself and friends of the family in Fort Worth reveal the fact that her condition is permanent.

Mr. GARD. The difficulty is that there is no medical testimony here that this can not be remedied. My position is this: It may be at this time it is premature to take action in giving the girl this sum of money. It may be that she is entitled to more and it may be, on the other hand, that she would not be entitled to so much, depending on the medical testimony which so far is not at all accurate.

Mr. LANHAM. I think the medical testimony is sufficient. There is a medical examination made by Army authorities December 29, 1919, of the girl's condition, in which they say it is permanent. A prior medical examination was made the day of the injury. In addition to that, if the gentleman could see the little girl and thus realize her condition, which is minimized rather than aggravated in these pictures, he would know that the injury is permanent as to the restoration of the face, to say nothing of the arms and hips. So far as the amount of this claim is concerned, that was determined by an official investigation by a board of officers appointed for that purpose who heard all the witnesses and saw and examined the child.

Mr. GARD. The proper way, it seems to me, would be to have the child taken to some competent medical authority for treatment such as could be afforded where cosmetic surgery is used and determine what can be done.

Mr. LANHAM. I will say that has been done to the extent these people can afford it. They have the letter mentioned from the Johns Hopkins Hospital. I have the opinion of a most competent physician, who is a graduate of Johns Hopkins and is recognized as one of the ablest men in our part of the country, and the Johns Hopkins people themselves will tell you that he is entirely capable of passing judgment on the case.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the doctor the gentleman refers to Dr. Bacon Saunders?

Mr. LANHAM. No; though he is an eminent surgeon also. I am referring to Dr. K. H. Beall, whose father before him was a famous surgeon, as the gentleman from Texas knows.

Mr. GLYNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. This accident occurred June 20, 1918?

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. GLYNN. A year and a half later you have the report of the Army surgeon of her condition at present.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes; and it was worse at that time than it was just after she was injured.

Mr. GARD. The report shows that the only medical treatment the girl had was embraced in the $25 received in March 28, 1919.

Mr. LANHAM. The report of the surgeon was that the injuries were sutured.

Mr. GARD. That simply means that they were sewed up.

Mr. LANHAM. Yes.

Mr. LAYTON. If the gentleman will yield, I want to say that I rode 900 miles, cut off a man's leg, treated him three months, and never got a penny.

Mr. GARD. Evidently the gentleman had no claim against Congress for that. [Laughter.]

Mr. LANHAM. Let me say to the gentleman from Ohio that the parents of this girl are poor people. The father is a man with only one leg, and thus hardly qualified for hard work.

Mr. GARD. Oh, the circumstances in the case unquestionably appeal to everyone.

Mr. LANHAM. What I mean to say is that a charge of $25 against this hard-working man might be equivalent to a charge of a great deal more to a person who is able to pay it.

Mr. GARD. It simply indicates that there was not very much done.

Mr. LANHAM. I do not think so, necessarily.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the distinguished jurist from Ohio has appointed attorneys in his court to represent parties probably in cases where, if they had been charged as a private client would, able to pay it, the fee would have amounted to several thousand dollars, when they got only a small amount because they had been appointed by the court.

Mr. GARD. Yes; and I have made some appointments where I did not think they earned what they did get.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. Yes.

Mr. SUMMERS of Washington. I want to say that after a surgical operation frequently but one dressing of the wound is necessary. The injury had already been inflicted, and it is quite possible that only one or two dressings were made after the wounds were sutured. That is modern surgery.

Mr. GARD. But under modern surgery when persons have facial injuries cosmetic surgery has developed to such an extent that very remarkable things are done in the way of restoring noses and other parts of the face, and nobody seems to have done anything like that here.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I took this matter up personally with Dr. Beall when he was here on his way to the Johns Hopkins Hospital—a man who is recognized in our section of the country and by the Johns Hopkins people as thoroughly qualified to speak in this matter—and he told me there was nothing in cosmetic surgery that would materially improve the condition of this child.

Mr. GARD. If the gentleman says that these injuries are permanent, I shall not object.

Mr. LANHAM. That is the report of the medical authorities in this case.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and the Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the legal guardian of the estate of Blanche Utley, a minor, of Fort Worth, Tarrant County, Tex., the sum of $5,000 in full compensation for injuries sustained by the said Blanche Utley due to an aeroplane owned by the United States Government while engaged in practice flying in Tarrant County, Tex., striking a barbed-wire fence near an automobile standing in a public road and in which said Blanche Utley was sitting, knocking said barbed wire loose from said fence and against the said occupant, Blanche Utley, of said automobile in such a manner and way as to injure and cut the said Blanche Utley, on the 20th day of June, A. D. 1918.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MASON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to print in the RECORD my remarks, together with a brief statement of the law as I think it is, in support of a resolution which I have offered to withdraw our troops from Europe.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by a brief statement of the law with reference to the withdrawal of troops from Europe. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal and the transaction of business upon the Speaker's table, at the conclusion of the remarks of Messrs. GARNER, LONGWORTH, and GREEN of Iowa, I be allowed to proceed for 30 minutes upon the matter of excess profits.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that on Tuesday next, after the reading of the Journal and the disposition of business on the Speaker's table, at the conclusion of the remarks of Messrs. GARNER, LONGWORTH, and GREEN of Iowa, he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of excess profits. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

VAN DORN IRON WORKS CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9257) for the relief of the Van Dorn Iron Works Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is there anyone here representing this matter?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman who is interested in this is absent, and if there be no objection I would be willing to have the matter go over.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the bill be passed over without prejudice. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

W. LOAIZA & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11067) to refund certain duties paid by W. Loaiza & Co.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that this bill be passed over without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

BENJAMIN O. KERLEE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 25) for the relief of Benjamin O. Kerlee.

The Clerk reported the bill by title.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, may we have the bill reported?

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Benjamin O. Kerlee the sum of $1,200 for injuries received while employed in the service of the Government as a workman in the Kaniksu National Forest, in the State of Idaho, during the year 1915.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, the bill being one for an appropriation to one Benjamin O. Kerlee for injuries received while in the employment of the Government and working in the national forest, I would ask the gentleman who has charge of the bill to explain it to the House, so that we may understand thoroughly the exact status of the matter.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, the situation as far as I know is this: This man was an employee of the Government of the United States in the Forestry Service, and in the performance of his duty he was injured by a falling tree. His leg and ankle were broken, his ribs were broken, and he was otherwise injured. He remained, I think, in bed for about 14 months, and at the end of that time his services in the Forestry Service were rejected because he was crippled and could not perform the duties required of that position. He had been in the service of the department, I think, for some two years before he was injured. That is, in brief, the situation about him.

Mr. GARD. The record, as I read it, shows that after the injury he was paid at the rate of $2.50 per day and the value of subsistence of $1 per day for 366 days, and that the amount received by him was $1,281, and at the end of the compensation period, which was the payment of this $1,281, the forest supervisor reported that he complained of being temporarily incapacitated for performing the duties in which he was then engaged, and he changed his occupation to that of a barber, for which he would not be incapacitated. That which I desire to be informed about is—of course, this man was injured, and unfortunately injured, but having once been paid a sum of money for 366 days, that which we have heretofore allowed in many cases—upon what theory is predicated now the payment of $1,200?

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Mr. Speaker, I think this man did receive certain compensation. He was not paid a year's salary, and I think while the man was in the hospital or while ill and unable to perform his duties they permitted him to continue upon the Government roll. Now, it appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that we are rather rigid in our rule when we say that the instant a man is injured in the Government service that his pay must stop, and if for a month or two months he continues on the pay roll and gets pay that that should be deducted from his compensation that the Government of the United States would ordinarily allow a man. I think it was 10 months instead of 12, as I read the report. I may be in error about that.

Mr. PARRISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARD. I will.

Mr. PARRISH. I notice in his sworn statement here he says that he paid out for doctors' bills and hospital bills $1,975 the first year following the injuries and the next year that he paid out $400 additional, making $2,375. The Government allowed him $1,300, and if we deduct the $1,300 from the amount that he paid out for hospital bills and doctors' bills it seems to me you have about the $1,200, and it seems to me a very meritorious claim.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. I thank the gentleman. This man is just like any other human being. He has a wife and three or four children, is a cripple and unable to care for himself, and it seems to me that the Government is rather niggardly that the instant he is injured and placed in that condition that he is to be thrown out upon the world and allowed to starve to death. I notice this, gentlemen, that when a Congressman of the United States gets sick they do not deduct his pay, and if he wants to run for the Senate and goes home and stays a month, and maybe a half a year, we do not deduct his pay, and when, unfortunately, he dies they give his heirs $7,500 and bury him and send a funeral train with him, but to some poor devil working in the service, who has a family that he can not support because of his crippled condition, the Government says, "I will give you a year's pay and you can move out." He might have spent every dollar of it in paying for getting his leg mended. I hope the gentleman will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, I reserved the right to object.

Mr. EDMONDS. I will say to the gentleman his statement is correct. The man was granted a year's pay. That has been the customary recompense the committee has given in cases of this kind.

Mr. GARD. I understand the committee has not gone beyond that.

Mr. EDMONDS. In one or two cases in seven or eight years we have gone beyond that. But the policy is to give a year's pay.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. As a matter of fact, is there any evidence in the record that he was given two years' pay? Is it not a fact that he continued on the roll for a year, and that that money was applied to the hospital charges and doctors' fees?

Mr. EDMONDS. Yes.

Mr. EVANS of Montana. Through the humanity of the people in the Forestry Service there, they let him stay on the roll.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, the Senate passed this bill, giving him additional recompense of $1,200, and if you will notice in the Senate report there it says:

> The circumstances of the case are so pitiable that a larger sum might justly be awarded, but the committee does not deem it wise to go beyond its usual rule of an allowance of one year's salary. Therefore the committee recommends an appropriation of $1,200, and has recommended that the bill be so amended as to provide therefor.

They knew in the Senate he had been kept on the roll for one year.

Mr. GARD. After he got one year's salary, how could he get a year's salary again?

Mr. EDMONDS. It is one of those things that I presume are governed by the circumstances of the case. The man has been so injured that he has to undergo another operation, which will probably keep him for six months in the hospital and cost him considerable money, and the Senate thought as long as he had not been repaired properly we ought to give him a little more money.

Mr. GARD. My position is this, that if the Committee on Claims, which has these matters in charge, is going to bring in bills it should adhere to a policy. If we are going to have bills here that are presented in the light of a year's compensation, which has heretofore been granted, we should understand it. On the other hand, if cases are presented on their own merits, cases of particular injuries, because of the loss sustained by the man, a pitiable case, in other words, and these cases are to be brought in here and exceptions made all the time, we ought to understand that, too.

Mr. EDMONDS. The gentleman knows that there is no law that allows us to make any recompense whatever. These cases have to be more or less studied in view of the conditions. In this case it was so especially pitiable that the committee thought it would be only right to give him a little additional recompense as long as he would probably spend it all in having his legs fixed properly.

Mr. BLANTON. A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think we have worked pretty hard to-day, and we ought to adjourn.

Mr. EDMONDS. The committee, as a general thing, does not like to go beyond the one year's allowance, and we have stuck to that very faithfully.

Mr. GARD. If the committee desires to stick to it, I will object to this.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, Mr. COOPER (at the request of Mr. MOORE of Ohio) was granted leave of absence for one week, on account of illness in his family.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. MACGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Italy in the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. To prefer a unanimous-consent request that I be permitted to extend my remarks in the RECORD in a discussion of the public business of Congress for the session.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD.

Mr. EDMONDS. On what subject?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On the discussion of public business of the Sixty-sixth Congress. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

REREFERENCE OF H. R. 13526—NATIONAL FOOD COMMISSION.

Mr. HAUGEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have the bill H. R. 13526, to create a national food commission, and so forth, rereferred to the Committee on Agriculture. It is now in the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent to rerefer the bill H. R. 13526 to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. HAUGEN. It is a bill introduced by Mr. BAER, and is to create a national food commission, to define its powers and duties, and to stimulate the production, sale, and distribution of live stock and live-stock products, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARD. Where is it now?

Mr. HAUGEN. It is now in the Committee on the Judiciary, and we ask that it be rereferred to the Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. GARD. Has the gentleman consulted with the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HAUGEN. I have, and it is agreeable to him.

Mr. GARD. Is he willing to relinquish jurisdiction of the matter?

Mr. HAUGEN. He is.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

HOUSE BILL NO. 4438 REFERRED.

Under clause 2, Rule XXIV, House bill 4438, to provide for the promotion of vocational rehabilitation of persons disabled in industry or otherwise and their return to civil employment; to the Committee on Education.

SUPREME LODGE OF THE ROYAL ORDER OF MOOSE.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill H. R. 2660, a bill incorporating a Supreme Lodge of the Royal Order of Moose, be rereferred to the Committee on the District of Columbia. I have consulted the chairmen of both the Committee on the District of Columbia and the Committee on the Judiciary, and they agree to this.

Mr. WALSH. The chairmen of the committees have not consulted the members of the committees. The Committee on the Judiciary has had a hearing on that measure. I do not think the chairman of the committee ought to consent to transferring jurisdiction after the committee has had a hearing, unless the committee itself has taken action.

Mr. GARLAND. I will say that the chairman of the committee advised me to make the request.

Mr. WALSH. Even that is not sufficient.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, there seems to be an unfortunate confusion about these incorporation matters. Simply because they sometimes contain a clause to be incorporated in the District of Columbia some of them have been sent to the Committee on the District of Columbia. Surely that is no reason, to my mind at least, for sending these matters to the Committee on the District of Columbia. They are primarily matters of incorporation.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman postpone the request.

Mr. GARLAND. Very well.

DESIGNATION OF THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE.

The SPEAKER. The Speaker is likely to be away Monday, Tuesday, and possibly Wednesday, and he designates Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas to preside on those days until he returns.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.), the House adjourned, pursuant to the order previously made, until Monday, April 26, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a copy of a communication from the Attorney General, submitting a supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Department of Justice for the fiscal year 1920 and 1919 (H. Doc. No. 736); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting estimate of appropriation required by the Treasury Department in the administration of the act of January 15, 1920, for the retirement of public-school teachers in the District of Columbia, being for the fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 737); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimate of appropriation required by the Smithsonian Institution for administration of the National Gallery of Art, fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 738); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. HERNANDEZ, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 2371) for the relief of Katheryn Walker, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 867), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10806) to provide for the abolition of the 80-rod reserved shore spaces between claims on shore waters in Alaska, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 868), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRELD: A bill (H. R. 13766) to amend section 6 of the act of March 3, 1919, entitled "An act to amend the Liberty-loan acts and the war-finance acts, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. HARRISON: A bill (H. R. 13767) to establish and maintain a fish hatchery and fish-cultural station in the State of Virginia; to the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries.

By Mr. MAPES (by request of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia): A bill (H. R. 13768) to authorize the widening of First Street NE., and for other purposes; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. McKEOWN: A bill (H. R. 13769) authorizing and directing the Secretary of the Interior to sell certain lands of restricted allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes to the actual settlers on terms not to exceed 20 annual payments, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. REAVIS: A bill (H. R. 13770) to amend certain sections of the corporation act of Congress of March 2, 1903 (32 Stat. L., 947–952), extended over American citizens in countries where the United States exercises extraterritorial jurisdiction by the provisions of section 4086, Revised Statutes, as interpreted by judicial decisions thereunder; to the Committee on the Territories.

By Mr. EVANS of Montana: A bill (H. R. 13771) to amend the revenue act of 1918 in regard to computation of surtax on the income of individuals and the computation of war profits and the excess-profits tax on the income of corporations; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

By Mr. MORIN: Joint resolution (H. J. Res. 344) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell to the city of Pittsburgh, Pa., a certain tract of land within the Allegheny Arsenal Reservation; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. CHRISTOPHERSON: Resolution (H. Res. 532) authorizing and directing the Federal Trade Commission to investigate the distribution and sale of print paper and report to the House of Representatives; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. FIELDS: Resolution (H. Res. 533) requesting the Federal Trade Commission to make certain inquiries into the prices of loose-leaf tobacco; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. LEHLBACH: Resolution (H. Res. 534) to provide for the consideration of S. 1699; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. GALLIVAN: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, urging the passage of a Federal daylight-saving law; to the committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, relative to the action of the United States Government in respect to certain Italian boundaries; to the Commitee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. TAGUE: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, relative to the action of the United States Government in respect to certain Italian boundaries; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial from the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, urging the passage of a Federal daylight-saving law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By the SPEAKER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, relative to the action of the United States Government in respect to certain Italian boundaries; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Also, memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, urging the passage of a Federal daylight-saving law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. DALLINGER: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, urging the passage of a Federal daylight-saving law; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. BURDICK: Memorial of the Legislature of the State of Rhode Island, recommending to Congress the passage of legislation providing for Federal inspection of inland barges; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, private bills and resolutions were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. ASHBROOK: A bill (H. R. 13772) granting an increase of pension to Moses Blackburn; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Also, a bill (H. R. 13773) granting an increase of pension to William M. Hockensmith; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BEGG: A bill (H. R. 13774) granting a pension to Albert E. Aldrich; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. BROOKS of Illinois: A bill (H. R. 13775) granting an increase of pension to John A. J. Hicks; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. DICKINSON of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 13776) for the relief of Phil Livingston; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. FIELDS: A bill (H. R. 13777) for the relief of James R. McGuire; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. GOULD: A bill (H. R. 13778) granting a pension to Corydon W. Clark; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. HUSTED: A bill (H. R. 13779) for the relief of Settimio Scogona; to the Committee on Claims.

By Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island: A bill (H. R. 13780) granting an increase of pension to Annie A. Lewis; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. NELSON of Wisconsin: A bill (H. R. 13781) granting an increase of pension to Marshall E. Crowther; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SHERWOOD: A bill (H. R. 13784) granting an increase of pension to John Seidel; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PETITIONS, ETC.

Under clause 1 of Rule XXII, petitions and papers were laid on the Clerk's desk and referred as follows:

3176. By the SPEAKER: Petition of the Presbytery of Washington City, urging a Federal amendment providing for uniform divorce laws, the regulation of motion-picture films, and prohibiting the transmission of betting and gambling odds from or into any State and the interstate transportation of gambling machines and devices; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3177. Also, petition of the Presbytery of Washington City, urging strict observance of the Sabbath in the District of Columbia; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

3178. Also, petition of citizens of Northampton, Hampshire County, Mass., urging the passage of the Lehlbach-Sterling bill, House bill 3149 and Senate bill 1699; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

3179. Also (by request), petition of the Child Welfare Association of Mamaroneck, N. Y., urging the passage of House bill 10925 and Senate bill 3259; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

3180. By Mr. BLAND of Missouri: Petition of citizens of Kansas City, Jackson County, Mo., urging the passage of House bill 10925 and Senate bill 3259; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

3181. By Mr. CARSS: Petition of the Federated Trades Assembly of Duluth, Minn., and the St. Paul (Minn.) Trades and Labor Assembly, demanding an investigation of the Bureau of Immigration; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

3182. By Mr. CULLEN: Petition of the National Association of Box Manufacturers, held at Chicago, Ill., favoring an abandonment of excess-profits tax, and that there be substituted a flat tax on sales; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3183. By Mr. FULLER of Illinois: Petition of the Navy Legal Aid Association, favoring the Wadsworth bill for increase in pay for the Navy; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

3184. Also, petition of the National Automobile Dealers' Association, for appropriation for the highway weather service; to the Committee on Appropriations.

3187. Also, petition of the National Printing and Engraving Co., Chicago, Ill., opposing House bill 12976; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3188. Also, petition of the Business Men's National Tax Committee, of New York, relative to the Federal taxation; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3189. Also, petition of the Rockford (Ill.) Manufacturers and Shippers' Association, opposing House bill 12379; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

3190. Also, petition of the Building Construction Employers' Association, opposing any measure that will further restrict immigration, etc.; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

3191. Also, petition of the Hostler Coal & Lumber Co., Chicago, Ill., for the repeal of the Lever Act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3192. Also, petition of the Private Soldiers and Sailors' Legion, relative to the bonus for the ex-service men of the World War; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3193. By Mr. GALLIVAN: Petition of Clarence L. Baxter and 17 other residents of Massachusetts, favoring a cash bonus for veterans; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3194. By Mr. MOONEY: Petition of the United Cloth Hat and Cap Makers, Local No. 18, and the Ladies' Garment Workers' Union, of Cleveland, Ohio, favoring the passage of S. J. Res. 171 and S. 1233; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3195. Also, petition of the Cleveland (Ohio) Chamber of Commerce, regarding the shipment and price of coal during the summer; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

3196. By Mr. O'CONNELL: Petition of the Robbins-Ripley Co., New York City, urging the passage of H. R. 13390; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

3197. Also, petition of the White Goods Workers' Union, Local No. 62, and the Cloak and Shirt Makers' Union, Local No. 11, of New York, regarding the prosecution of certain political offenders in the United States; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3198. Also, petition of the joint conference on retirement, Washington, D. C., favoring the passage of the Sterling-Lehlbach civil-service retirement bill; to the Committee on Reform in the Civil Service.

3199. By Mr. RAKER: Petition of the Leslie Jones Department Store, of Redding, Calif., protesting against the Steagall bill, H. R. 12379; to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

3200. Also, petition of the Northern California Milk Producers' Association, urging the passage of the Capper-Hersman bill; to the Committee on Agriculture.

3201. Also, petition of the Craft Post, No. 15, American Legion, Sisson, Calif., indorsing the "fourfold-plan bonus" for the ex-service men of the World War; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3202. Also, petition of the committee of the Western Forestry and Conservation Association, indorsing the Sinnott bill, H. R. 9539; to the Committee on the Public Lands.

3203. Also, petition of the National Automobile Dealers' Association of America, urging appropriation to continue the highway weather service; to the Committee on Appropriations.

3204. Also, petition of the Moore Shipbuilding Co., of Oakland, Calif., urging the passage of H. R. 2692; to the Committee on Claims.

3205. By Mr. ROWAN: Petition of V. Vivandou, New York City, opposing H. R. 12976; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

3206. Also, petition of Molly Lifshitz, secretary-treasurer I. L. G. W. U., Local No. 62, New York, and the Ladies and Misses' I. L. G. W. U., Local No. 1, New York City, relative to the American civil and military prisoners, etc.; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3207. Also, petition of Gilbert M. Smith, president Manhattan Brass Co., New York City, opposing any further restriction on immigration, etc.; to the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

3208. Also, petition of the Robbins-Ripley Co., New York City, urging the passage of H. R. 13390; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

3209. Also, petition of the Three hundred and fifth Infantry Post, of New York, favoring further relief for disabled soldiers, etc.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

3210. Also, petition of the women's auxiliary of the Republican organization of the nineteenth assembly district of New York, favoring the Smith-Towner educational bill; to the Committee on Education.

3211. Also, petition of the National Automobile Dealers' Association, favoring maintenance of daily report on condition of highways in the United States by the Weather Bureau; to the Committee on Agriculture.

3212. Also, petition of H. Brodsky, of the Cloak and Skirt Makers' Union of Brooklyn, N. Y., favoring release of political prisoners; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3213. Also, petition of the board of directors of the Rotary Club of New York, favoring passage of the Fess-Capper bill to promote physical training in the United States; to the Committee on Education.

3214. Also, petition of the Veterans' Committee on Soldiers' Home, St. Cloud, Fla., urging the passage of the Sears bill, H. R. 3468; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

3215. Also, petition of citizens of the State of Washington, urging the passage of House bill 1112; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

3216. By Mr. TAGUE: Petition of the Navy Legal Aid Association, urging the immediate enactment of the Wadsworth bill increasing pay of enlisted men; to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

SENATE.

SATURDAY, April 24, 1920.

(Legislative day of Friday, April 23, 1920.)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock noon, on the expiration of the recess.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Gronna	McLean	Spencer
Brandegee	Harris	McNary	Sterling
Capper	Harrison	Nelson	Swanson
Chamberlain	Henderson	New	Thomas
Comer	Jones, Wash.	Overman	Townsend
Curtis	Kellogg	Page	Trammell
Dial	Kendrick	Phipps	Warren
Dillingham	Kenyon	Sheppard
Fernald	McCormick	Simmons
Gerry	McCumber	Smith, Md.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH].

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is absent on account of illness in his family.

Mr. GRONNA. I wish to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Thirty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present. The roll of absentees will be called.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. CULBERSON, Mr. GLASS, Mr. LENROOT, Mr. RANSDELL, and Mr. WADSWORTH answered to their names when called.

Mr. NUGENT, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, Mr. KEYES, Mr. LODGE, Mr. SMITH of Arizona, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. UNDERWOOD, Mr. KIRBY, and Mr. MCKELLAR entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-one Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. STERLING. On Tuesday last, the bill (H. R. 10917) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States," was received from the House, and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] asked that it be referred to the Committee on Education and Labor. To that there was some objection by the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], who suggested that it should go to the Committee on the Judiciary. At the instance of the Senator from Utah the bill was ordered to lie upon the table. I understand that the Senator from Iowa is agreed that the bill may be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and I ask that that reference be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection the bill will be so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Overhue, one of its clerks, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 9629) for the relief of the Merritt & Chapman Derrick & Wrecking Co.

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2448) for the relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had passed the bill (S. 2890) to provide for the allotment of land of Crow Tribe, for the distribution of tribal funds, and for other purposes, with amendments, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolution, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

H. R. 2396. An act for the relief of John A. Gauley;

H. R. 10317. An act for the relief of Blanche Utley; and

H. J. Res. 302. Joint resolution authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. LODGE. I present a series of resolutions adopted by the Legislature of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts favoring legislation for daylight saving, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

The resolutions were referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS,
In the year one thousand nine hundred and twenty.

Resolutions urging the passage of a Federal daylight-saving law.

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States a daylight-saving bill, so called, which puts the clock forward during the summer season for the Eastern States, now under United States standard eastern time: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the General Court of Massachusetts, believing it to be established by the experience of the past two years that the daylight-saving law has contributed to the health and efficiency of the people of the United States and to economy in the various means of heating and lighting, hereby urges the enactment of the aforesaid bill into law; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent by the secretary of the Commonwealth to the presiding officers of both branches of Congress and to the Senators and Representatives in Congress from this Commonwealth.

In senate, adopted April 5, 1920.
In house of representatives, adopted, in concurrence, April 8, 1920.
A true copy.
Attest:

ALBERT T. LANGLEY,
Secretary of the Commonwealth.

Mr. SUTHERLAND presented a memorial of the congregation of the Church of the Brethren, of Beaver Run, W. Va., and a memorial of the Church of the Brethren, of Old Furnace, W. Va., remonstrating against compulsory military training, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment providing that the United States park police be allowed increased compensation for the fiscal year 1921, in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the District of Columbia appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanmous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. MCNARY:

A bill (S. 4285) requiring the branding of the manufacturers' selling price on shoes transported in interstate commerce, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Manufactures.

By Mr. NELSON:

A bill (S. 4286) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the incorporated town of Petersburg, Alaska, to issue bonds in any sum not exceeding $75,000 for the purpose of constructing and installing a municipal electric light and power plant, and for the construction of a public-school building," approved September 29, 1919; to the Committee on Territories.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. Swem, one of his clerks, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the act (S. 4073) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City.

HOUSE BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The following bills were each read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Claims:

H. R. 2396. An act for the relief of John A. Gauley; and

H. R. 10317. An act for the relief of Blanche Utley.

H. J. Res. 302. Joint resolution authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass., was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask that the unfinished business may be laid before the Senate and proceeded with.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the committee amendment. It will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, strike out "$20,000,000" and insert "$27,000,000," so as to read:

That the sum of $27,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

And so forth.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to engage in a detailed discussion of the proposed legislation. I, however, wish the indulgence of the Senate for a short time to present my views chiefly with reference to the policy upon which the pending bill was framed. The bill as it came from the House would make the most niggardly provision for river and harbor maintenance and improvement ever heretofore, so far as I recall, proposed by any committee of either branch of the Congress. As a matter of common knowledge, for many years an organized propaganda has been conducted in this country against expenditures by the Government for the improvement of inland waterways. It has been charged, and it is generally believed, that this propaganda was largely inspired and fostered by the railroads for selfish purposes. However that may be, the object of the propaganda was to arouse popular prejudice against river and, in some instances, harbor improvements. It has been one of the most active propagandas ever conducted in this country. By the dissemination of misleading and sometimes false information with respect to the manner in which river and harbor bills are prepared in committee and passed through Congress, by unfounded attacks upon the engineers of the Government who investigated and reported upon the feasibility in the interest of commerce, of the items of improvement embraced in these bills, and by minimizing in every way the benefits which have resulted from Government expenditures in these improvements, a public sentiment not only unfriendly but actually hostile to legislation of this character has been created.

River and harbor legislation has been labeled as "pork-barrel" legislation, and the money spent for this purpose as a reckless and wasteful use of public funds. Undoubtedly much prejudice against expenditures for these purposes has been aroused, and it is now charged that an effort is being made in the Congress to utilize this prejudice for partisan purposes. In these circumstances it is not difficult to understand the reasoning of those who think that the partisan economy pretense about which we now hear so much will be advanced more by cutting off a few millions from the estimate presented by the department than by lopping off a few hundred millions from departmental estimates for more popular purposes. Upon this theory it is said that the House committee at the dictation of a political steering committee to make a show of economy for campaign purposes cut the estimates of the Engineer Department for rivers and harbors in half. If any such considerations influenced the reduction in the estimates of the department to the insignificant sum carried in the House bill, I do not think it can be too severely condemned. Mr. President, I want to say on behalf of the Committee on Commerce, of which I am a member, that if there has been any attempt at dictation by a partisan committee, I know nothing of it and have seen no evidences of it. That committee has very substantially increased the appropriation proposed in the House bill. It has not raised it to the amount of the department estimate, but it has added $8,000,000 to the amount carried in the House bill.

While I am not satisfied with the amount which the bill as reported to the Commerce Committee carries and think it still wholly inadequate, my purpose in the further observations I shall make will be not so much to criticize the amount of the appropriations provided as to dissent from the policy that obtained in the making of the bill, not only in the committee of the House but of the Senate. The dominating feature of that policy is that no new schemes of river and harbor improvement should be adopted or undertaken. This policy of restriction in the improvement of our harbors utterly ignores the fact that our commerce has increased several fold in the past few years, and is still increasing, and it overlooks the fact that in this period our ships of commerce have increased and are still increasing in a much greater degree. Moreover, it ignores the fact that while these increases have been taking place our railroad mileage has not increased and is not likely to materially increase for a long time to come; that only a few congested harbors of the North Atlantic seaboard have been adequately developed, while the great harbors on the Pacific coast, the Gulf, and the South Atlantic are, in the main, unimproved and inadequately prepared to accommodate the traffic which the new policy of the Government, as forecast in the action of the Railroad Administration and the Shipping Board, and as further developed and declared in the shipping bill now pending in the Commerce Committee, is calculated to promote and develop. The policy implied in the attitude of the committee does not stop with a refusal to even so much as consider the adoption of any new program of improvement and development of our harbors.

It goes much further and proposes that where Congress has actually entered upon the improvement of a river or harbor, if the present needs of commerce do not require the immediate completion of that project it shall be abandoned temporarily and no expenditure made except to protect against deterioration. Because of the adoption of this policy many of the great projects upon which we have entered in the interest of commerce, which are only partially completed and, in many instances, which lack only a small additional expenditure to become available for the uses of commerce, are, for the present if not permanently, to be abandoned. Against such a line of policy I most earnestly protest and insist that now is the time of all times in our history calling for a forward-looking and not a backward-looking policy with respect to the develpment of our system of transportation by water as well as by rail, with a view to the development of our commerce, internal and external, to the full extent of its potentialities. I assert and strenuously insist that present conditions with respect to facilities for the movement and accommodation of our stupendous trade appeal for liberality rather than cheeseparing economy of expenditures in developing agencies for its transportation, and for the Congress to deliberately resolve in these conditions to enter upon no new projects of harbor and waterway improvements in order to save a few thousand dollars when millions and billions are involved is, to my mind, so shortsighted and so reckless in its disregard of the national interest as to be utterly incredible. If it is done to subserve party interest, it is criminal. If it is done through mistaken judgment, it is discreditable and is in itself an indictment against the capacity of the party in power to wisely legislate in the public interest. In short, we can not approve and adopt this policy without shutting our eyes to the outstanding facts of the present situation with respect to our world trade and the conditions, extent, and requirements of our land and ocean transportation facilities.

Mr. President, what is the condition with reference to our harbor and transportation facilities? On yesterday the able Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] told the Senate that about 80 per cent of the entire foreign trade of the United States during the last year passed through the harbor of New York. The statement of the Senator from New York in this respect is, I think, approximately true, and it is a pity that it is true. Think of a great country like ours, 3,000 miles wide, over 2,000 miles long, every section of it engaged in the production and the consumption of articles that enter into foreign commerce, and yet 80 per cent of that commerce, amounting in the single month of March just passed to over a billion and a quarter of dollars, must be hauled hundreds and thousands of miles overland going from or coming to one congested outlet and inlet located on the North Atlantic coast. Will any Senator say that this situation is either healthy or economical? Will any Senator deny that it involves an indefensible, not to say intolerable, waste in time, in human energy, and in money? Does any Senator advocate the continuance of such a condition? And does not the situation thus presented—a situation which only recently resulted in such widespread industrial congestion and demoralization—suggest the imperative necessity for the immediate utilization of the neglected and idle harbors of our Atlantic, Gulf, and Pacific coasts? This condition of port congestion arrests expansion, and while retarding adds enormously to the cost of distribution. The people may endure for a while conditions which restrict industrial development and impose burdens upon the distribution of their products, but they will not submit to it long.

Think of the condition of the South, a great industrial section, a great agricultural section, with its splendid natural ports from Jacksonville to Norfolk, producing many of the things that we sell to South and Central America, and buying and consuming many of the things that we buy from these countries, countries that may be described as next-door neighbors of this section. Think of transportation conditions which require this section to haul its products destined to South and Central American markets in many cases a thousand miles by rail up the Atlantic coast to New York, and thence shipping them on their way to their final destination a thousand miles down that coast right by the ocean gateways to the harbors of Wilmington, Charleston, Savannah, and Jacksonville. Think of the burden of cost involved in this process of distribution. What is true of the States of the South Atlantic seaboard is true of some of the States on the Pacific seaboard and the Gulf coast, and, to a lesser extent, true of that great region known as the Central West, which lies hundreds of miles nearer to these ports than to those of the North Atlantic, to which they have to go now. Think of what it would mean in relieving this waste in transportation and of what it would mean in relieving railroad congestion in certain sections if, instead of all this traffic having to be hauled by a few lines of railway to the seaboard, it could be divided among many lines, relieving congestion of the overburdened roads and increasing the revenue of the underfed roads leading to these neglected and idle ports. If this could be done, it would measurably solve the question of the adequacy of transportation in this country. Mr. President, I am glad to say that a promising beginning looking to this result has been made.

Two difficulties have been in the way of the utilization of these idle ports in the past. One of them was the lack of ships; the other was discrimination in export and import rates, both land and ocean rates, against these ports and in favor of ports of the North Atlantic. As a result of an energetic movement, not only on the part of shippers in the South Atlantic, but on the part of shippers in the Central West, this discrimination in rates, both ocean and inland, has been removed, and the Shipping Board has allocated ships for the establishment of lines between these ports and the islands of the West Indies and South and Central American Republics, and some of them are in operation, with a business already developed to promising proportions. The Committee of Commerce have now under consideration a broad and comprehensive scheme providing for the continued utilization of these harbors and the continuance of these newly established routes, even if it shall become necessary for the Government itself to operate them. But, Mr. President, these harbors, as I said, have been neglected; they have not in the past been improved to any very great extent because it was said that their developed commerce would not justify it. And now we are told that this is not the time for the Government to enter upon new projects of river and harbor improvement. How long will this policy be adhered to, and must we wait indefinitely before the Government will be permitted to improve and develop these harbors to meet these new conditions of trade, the development of which is so important in connection with our efforts to capture the great trade awaiting us in the countries just to the south of us?

Will anybody say, in the light of present conditions, that money spent to put these neglected harbors in a condition to subserve this great trade would be unwisely spent and that it is wise economy to postpone appropriations for this purpose? And yet, Mr. President, under the policy of this bill these improvements, however urgently needed as the result of present conditions and the development of new routes which have been ordered to be established by the Shipping Board and to which ships have been allocated, can have no appropriation made for their advancement unless it can be shown that the engineers have heretofore recommended the improvement and that Congress has, by making an initial appropriation, adopted the project. This blind and restrictive policy was adopted when the last river and harbor bill was framed and approved by the Congress. It was ill adapted to the conditions which then existed; it is less adapted to the conditions which now exist. But, Mr. President, I am talking too long and I am venturing into fields I had not intended to traverse. My purpose in the observations I have made has been to impress upon the Senate the importance and wisdom, in the conditions which now confront us, of liberal instead of niggardly appropriations, or no appropriations at all, to put our harbors in condition to accommodate the great foreign trade we have already developed and the still greater trade of the future, and of continuing to improve our rivers and harbors as the best means of supplementing our insufficient rail transportation. In the present condition of our rail transportation I can conceive of no more short-sighted policy than the neglect of our waterways, which at this time seem to furnish the only feasible means of adequately supplementing rail transportation and thereby protecting the industries of the country against the menace which now threatens to arrest their further development and expansion.

What, Mr. President, is the situation with respect to our rail transportation? For 8 or 10 years our railroad facilities have been admittedly inadequate, and yet during that period, industrially the most progressive period in our history, there has been practically no increase in the railroad mileage of the country. Railroad building has practically ceased, while the demands for transportation have almost doubled. Where is the money to be found to finance the building of the additional mileage required? If the railroads had all the money needed for this purpose, it would still require five or six years, possibly more, before the demands for additional transportation could be fully supplied. But the railroads have no surplus. They are overburdened with debt; they are behind, not ahead, in their finances. I repeat, they have no money for new construction and but slim, if any, chance of raising it. A policy which in these circumstances militates against the utilization of our waterways to supplement rail transportation is, to my mind, the height of folly and approaches the very verge of stupidity. Instead of curtailing our river and harbor improvement work in these conditions, every dollar that is necessary or that can be economically used for their improvement to supply the future as well as present needs of commerce should be appropriated. A policy with respect to the transportation requirements of a country like ours which fails to anticipate future needs and conditions and provide for those conditions before they overtake and overwhelm us is necessarily a short-sighted policy.

Mr. President, there is no vision in this bill; it is short-sighted and narrow. If it were left to me, I would pursue as liberal a policy toward improvement of our rivers and harbors as I would pursue in reference to our Army and our Navy or any other instrumentality of Government. The Army and Navy are necessary to our national defense and must be maintained, regardless of expense. So must our other necessary governmental activities, but the means for the support and maintenance of these necessary functions of government, greater to-day than ever before in the history of our country, greater than those of any other country in the world, must come from the commercial activities of our people. We hear much talk in these days of the enormous amounts the Government must of necessity expend for this and that public service. We hear much about our vast indebtedness. These obligations can not be avoided or escaped; they have got to be met and discharged, and they can not be met and discharged if we neglect to foster and develop in every way in our power the commerce and industries of the people. Mr. President, these considerations demand that we should not only develop and utilize the transportation potentiality of our rivers and harbors but that we should compel our railroads to cooperate with our waterways to the fullest extent in furnishing needed facilities to aid our great and growing commerce and trade, whether domestic or foreign.

For these reasons, in my judgment, no greater mistake has been made by the Congress during the past few years than in the niggardly, cheeseparing policy it has pursued and which it is proposed in this bill to continue with reference to the improvement and development of our rivers and harbors. It is a policy which fails to provide for the present or to anticipate the future in a way and to an extent that is discreditable to the lawmaking power of the Nation. I am going to vote for this bill, but I hope it may be amended so as to substantially increase the amount of the lump sum to be appropriated. I shall vote for amendments for this purpose. I shall vote for an amendment to increase it $4,000,000. I shall vote for an amendment to increase it $7,000,000. I would vote for an amendment, if offered, for a still greater increase. Before taking my seat I want to say, Mr. President, that I earnestly hope this is the last river and harbor bill that will have to run the gauntlet of manufactured prejudice and the exigencies of a political campaign. I protest against the injection of politics into purely business legislation. If it is desired to make a record for economy there is ample opportunity to cut down expenses without injury but with benefit to the country. It is indefensible to attempt to make a record of economy at the expense of the business interests of the country, its development and its expansion.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, the bill before us this afternoon has a direct bearing upon the high cost of Government, and the high cost of Government has a direct bearing on the high cost of living, which prompts me to submit a few observations on a subject in which I am very much interested.

Mr. President, while the Department of Justice is pursuing the profiteer with steakless Thursdays and the Treasury Department is fortifying the people with preachments on thrift and economy, another epidemic of strikes and industrial disorder has come upon us as the result of rampant, long-continued, unrestricted profiteering and we go on increasing prices.

No country can adjust itself to constantly increasing prices. No country can be enriched by the gouge process. Our delusion of prosperity continues, but our volume of business is declining, as might be expected. Prices for American products have soared so high that both home consumption and what foreign demand there is are failing us. Between high profits and high taxes the people have been hit hard. As a source of wealth for business or for exploitation they are not inexhaustible. And the results we are getting are telling the story.

The extent to which the people have been bled by war and extortion is almost unbelievable. A recent statistical report relates that 79,642 American corporations, many of whose stockholders are now dodging their income taxes through stock dividends, averaged gross profits of more than $500,000,000 apiece in a single year. It is illuminating also to learn that in just one year during the war the gross income of American corporations rose from thirty-five and one-third billions to eighty-four and a half billions. In a single year the war gave us 10,173 new corporations, and they are few in number, indeed, who have not piled up enormous net profits and great wealth on the capital invested.

The proof of profiteering is the margin of profit. We know that margin has never been wider, nor greed more insatiable.

Do you suppose, Mr. President, that the people who pinch, skimp, and are being forced to do without many things they need, in order that we may continue to double the prewar number of our millionaires every twelvemonth, thrill with patriotic fervor whenever they read an unctious lesson on thrift and 100 per cent Americanism from one of these 1,000 per cent American tax-dodging grandstanders, or that it merely arouses their American dander and promotes wrath and profanity?

The same day a Texas cotton raiser wrote me he had to go to the public works in order to pay the grocery bill for which he went in debt while raising his 1919 crop. I read in a New York newspaper that the net profits of the Amoskeag spinning mills for 1919 were seven times greater than those it cleared in 1917, and that its 1918 profits were thirteen times greater than those it earned in the four years between 1912 and 1916.

All this, over and above deductions for taxes, high cost of labor and materials, and all the other things which we are commonly and repeatedly informed are responsible for the exorbitant prices this and other corporations are allowed to charge the American people for the actual necessities of life.

This cotton farmer wrote me:

> The profiteers have cleaned me up, and what is still more they will be on the job next year and the next, and so on until we all become reds, radicals, Bolsheviks, and devils. I am tired making millionaires of 2,000 popeyed parasites each year while reducing my family to pauperism. I don't want to blow up anybody or any institution, for I prefer to live like and act like a white man, but this profiteering all along the line will have to stop or I shan't be able to do either.

From a man in his circumstances I do not call that an intemperate letter. In fact, it shows great restraint.

The mill that took this man's cotton at a price which, because of the general prevalence of profiteering, impoverished him and his hard-working family, increased its margin of profit from 2¾ cents on every dollar of its sales in 1917 to 15½ cents in 1919. And this Government is supposed to be hunting for profiteers.

Mr. President, the speculation and profiteering in cotton and cotton goods has been open, flagrant, scandalous. The Associated Press, just a few days ago, carried the information where all the world might read, that the Belton Cotton Mills, at Belton, S. C., had declared a dividend of 100 per cent, and that the Easley Cotton Mills, of Easley, S. C., had declared a stock dividend of 300 per cent. It is equally well known that the Senate committee investigating the high cost of living was recently presented with visual and auricular proof that the spread between the farm price of cotton and the store price of cotton materials was about 1,800 per cent, and that the retail price of cotton goods is so high that ordinary persons can scarcely buy bedding, cottons, muslins, and ginghams. If this is not grand larceny in the daytime, I do not know what else we should call it.

A New York newspaper, the Evening World, recently published the profit records of big corporations like the Amoskeag Manufacturing Co., the American Hide & Leather Co., the Woolen Trust, the Cotton Trust, the Steel Trust, the United Fruit Co., the Standard Milling Co., the Tobacco Products Corporation, the Manhattan Shirt Co., the United Drug Co., the American Linseed Co., and others, and proved by their own reports that their earnings have far more than kept pace with their cost and taxes, exceeding them in not infrequent instances from 100 to several hundred per cent, and in some cases far exceeding 1,000 per cent. In each instance the attention of the Attorney General was directed to this easily accessible evidence. But nothing has come of it.

At this moment the most brazen challenge of the Government we have had in this long saturnalia of greed comes from the gamblers in sugar. We are told, Mr. President, the refineries are unable to provide for the enormous new stocks of sugar. But a corner in sugar has evidently been formed right under the eyes of the Department of Justice. As a consequence, no such wild scramble for sugar shares ever was known. Cuban-American at 580 rose 40 points in one day. Forty thousand shares of Punta Alegre were sold at a rise of 11 points. Tens of thousands of shares of other members of the sugar group were sold at advanced quotations, while sugar-refining stocks also boomed because of the increase of spread between the raw and the refined product.

Mr. President, this body and this Government are soon to hear very emphatically from the people in regard to the profiteering in sugar. The canning season raid is on. The price already is rising about a dollar a week wholesale in early anticipation of the canning season. For years the sugar interests have annually and shamelessly and openly robbed American housewives during the canning season. They have, with their extortionate charges, as regularly blighted the poor family's only hope of putting up and storing away a cheap and wholesome supply of fruits and vegetables for winter. Every principle of healthful living demands just these things in the family diet. But the Sugar Trust is allowed to prey on the health and welfare of this Nation every year in the canning season that it may enrich itself further by profits running high in the hundreds of millions. The people are helpless; there is no real substitute for sugar. It is piracy so colossal and so criminal that Capt. Kidd and all the famous pirates of history become Sunday-school characters by comparison. How long is this Government going to stand for it?

Sugar speculators blandly predict sugar will sell at 30 cents or more a pound retail when the canning season opens. Conservative wholesalers say the price to the consumer will reach or exceed 50 cents a pound before it closes. One billion pounds of sugar have recently been exported from these shores to Great Britain in addition to the millions of pounds shipped abroad during recent weeks or months, says a current news report. This Government owes it to itself and to the American people to declare at once an embargo on sugar and to seize immediately every stock of this commodity in the United States for distribution to the consumer at cost, because a Government that is sworn to protect its people permits this robbery and puts no curb upon it. This profit-taking campaign and canning-time hike of the speculators and profiteers in sugar now surpasses in barefaced, nation-wide grand larceny any brutal and impudent demand yet made on this long-suffering and outraged Nation. The American colonists went to war with George III for much less when they dumped his taxed tea in Boston Harbor and defied him. Are we now to permit a few score of reckless and greedy exploiters to victimize the American people at will?

These profiteers are known but they go unpunished. Wall Street's melon patches continue to be warmed by the sun of privilege, fertilized by the perspiration of labor, and watered by the tears of poverty, and this year will raise a record-breaking crop free from the blight of income taxes, while the people are being urged to buy their coal early and be robbed for less, to abstain from steak one day a week, and to purchase war savings stamps that Uncle Sam may live on in nine-billion style on a six-billion-a-year income.

Mr. President, if the law-enforcement officers of this Government can not enforce the laws they should resign and let men who can take their places. A Government that could whip the Hun 4,000 miles from home and wreck the German spy system is strong enough to stop this wholesale pillage of the people at home and so remove the cause of strikes and unrest.

The Wall Street Journal publishes a list of 62 corporations which declared stock dividends aggregating $321,009,952 during 1916, 1917, and 1918, on which the Government will now have to refund income taxes. Stock dividends of millions of other surplus profits that the Supreme Court has ruled are principal, and therefore not taxable for income, are being made daily by other corporations. As further conclusive evidence of prolonged, unlimited, and unconscionable profiteering by great aggregations of capital I offer this list of corporations that have recently declared stock dividends ranging in amount from one-fifth of their total investment to double and triple their entire capital. Note the high percentages:

Continental Oil, 200 per cent; United Fuel Gas, 200 per cent; Ohio Fuel Supply, 100 per cent; Nonquit Spinning Co., 100 per cent; Amoskeag Cotton Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; Stutz Motors, 100 per cent; Nashua Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; American Tobacco Security Co., 75 per cent; Manomet Mills 55⅝ per cent; Hood Rubber Co., 66⅔ per cent; Crucible Steel, 50 per cent; Cleveland-Akron Bag, 50 per cent; Union Bag & Paper, 50 per cent; Auto-Car Co., 40 per cent; John R. Thompson Co., 33⅓ per cent; St. Maurice Paper Co., 30 per cent; F. W. Woolworth, 30 per cent; Electric Welding of Boston, 25 per cent; Delaware & Cleveland, 25 per cent; Hawaiian Pineapple Co., 25 per cent; Electric Welding Co., 25 per cent; General Chemical Co., 20 per cent; American Multigraph, 20 per cent; Truscan Steel, 20 per cent.

The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana has recently increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $30,000,000, giving its stockholders a stock dividend of 2,900 per cent.

Also it is instructive to learn that the National Candy Co.'s earnings last year showed an increase of 545 per cent over 1915; that Burns Bros., the largest retail coal dealers in the United States, made a net profit of 40 cents a ton, against 23½ cents in 1916; that the earnings of the United Drug Co., doing a business of $50,000,000 annually, were 242 per cent greater than 1916; that the American Ice Co., which cuts ice by the millions, but not profits, has in the last four years increased its earnings 283 per cent; that the International Cotton Co., doing nearly $8,000,000 worth of business last year, made 39 per cent more money, although it sold 20 per cent fewer goods; that the Pacific Mills' output of cotton and worsted dress goods produced 34 per cent more profit than in the year before the war; and that the excess-profit surplus of United States Steel—the surplus remaining after dividends—has aggregated nearly $500,000,000 in the last five years, although $315,000,000 was spent on improvements.

These patriotic melon raisers, who have made their millions and billions during and since the war, now are urging that the soldiers' bonus be raised by a 1 per cent tax on sales to be paid on every dollar spent by every man, woman, and child in the country, including the ex-service men themselves. Mr. President, I shall favor placing this tax right where it belongs—on war profits—and taking from these huge stock dividends, from excess war profits, and from the profiteers, all that is needful to compensate the men who sacrificed themselves instead of their country, or their countrymen, in time of war.

During the coal strike, while zero cold and privation threatened the people, the price of crude oil shot up nearly 300 per cent, and still is rising. The oil men have the same golden rule as the lumbermen and the sugar barons, namely, their price limit is all they can compel the consumer to pay, and they are scientific compellers. There is none more compelling. They have boosted oil from 40 cents, in 1915, to $3 a barrel and higher, a gain of more than 650 per cent; and while prices are being screwed up a notch or two more "to encourage production" their wives are importing $250,000 works of art from Europe and stopping at no extravagance at home.

The papers told yesterday of a Texas oil company that is expected soon to cut a 400 per cent stock-dividend melon. Each stockholder will be permitted to buy one new share at $100 for every share of old stock he holds. The old shares are now quoted at $850, having risen to that figure from a par value of $100.

It is said the poor man's luxury is tobacco. Its use is so general that it is even considered a necessity by many persons. It is interesting to note in this connection that the contribution to good government of the Tobacco Products Corporation is a dividend balance showing a rise of 1,547 per cent over its 1914 profits, which the smoker had to pay or go without this solace.

Smokers generally will be interested in learning that the General Cigar Co., which in 1906 acquired the property and business of the old United Cigar Co., amassed a net income of nearly 34 cents on each dollar of its sales in 1917, and in 1919 this had grown to almost 38 cents, notwithstanding nearly all 7-cent cigars in the market have recently been advanced to 8 cents retail.

Other upholders of government and befrienders of the poor are the American Hide & Leather Co., whose profits for 1919 were more than three and one-half times larger than those it gained in 1914; the Central Leather Co., whose 1919 profits more than double those of the same months in 1918; and the Endicott-Johnson Shoe Manufacturing Corporation, whose profits rose from $2,174,430 in 1915 to $9,791,580 in 1919.

In terms of dividends on its common stock, last year's profits of the American Hide & Leather Co. increased from 44 cents a share in 1915 to $15.52 a share in 1919, or thirty-five times the earnings it distributed in 1915, and they were ample.

During the first nine months of the same year, while the Government was hunting high and low for rampant profiteers, and the price of shoes was steadily going higher and the price of hides was as steadily going lower, the net earnings of the Central Leather Co. increased 55 per cent, or about 103 per cent over the average nine months of 1918. Its accumulated surplus rose from seven and three-fourths millions in 1914 to thirty and one-fourth millions in 1919. Yet despite these swollen profits the public is being warned that shoes are going to cost more instead of less.

Mr. President, for four years wheat farmers, as a whole, have little more than broken even. The size of the American loaf has been reduced for the first time in history, and the price has been nearly doubled. But the net profits of the 15 plants of the Standard Milling Co. have been increased 100 per cent, but not because of increased wages and taxes.

The National Enameling & Stamping Co. makes kitchen ware. Prior to the war it successfully met the severe competition of Germany and earned a fair return on its investment. In three recent years it has run up its net profits 326 per cent, because it could hold up American housewives and there was no one to say it nay. A Wall Street report says this company earned in the month of January alone enough to pay all its fixed charges and preferred dividends for the year. Here is a fine example of unmitigated, overreaching greed.

I have recently received a letter from Lakin C. Taylor, of the Pittsburgh Tin Plate & Steel Corporation. The Pittsburgh Tin Plate & Steel Corporation, with plants or offices in Pittsburgh, New York, Philadelphia, Chicago, Baltimore, Rochester, Cleveland, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Columbus, Albany, Newark, Toledo, and Syracuse, offers to sell me or my friends some of the Pittsburgh company's stock. It writes me under date of March 27 last that additions planned for its mills should increase present earnings over 300 per cent. And, as if this were not sufficiently inviting, it points out that "every operating tinplate and sheet-steel mill has made enormous fortunes for its stockholders, many of their common shares selling at 1,500 per cent premium."

A similar steel company—

So the letter relates—organized by the head of this corporation earned 77 per cent last year, and the holders of the common stock made a profit of over 1,000 per cent.

Here is one profiteer who cheerfully admits it in writing on his own letterhead sent through the United States mails, which guarantees the facts in that letter are as stated, as the mails of the United States can not be used to defraud. I respectfully refer these facts to the Attorney General.

Profits of the American Sugar Refining Co. were confessedly $15,000,000 for 1919, compared with $12,000,000 for the preceding year, although this corporation's share of the business in the United States has dwindled from 60 per cent in 1900, when it had virtually a monopoly, down to 27 per cent.

During the last few years the sugar companies have declared stock dividends from surplus profits aggregating millions—on which Uncle Sam must now refund income taxes—besides regular and excessive cash dividends. Even the earnings of the American Beet Sugar Co. are expected to show profits of $15 a share for 1919, compared with $6 the preceding year. And sugar is taking another leap skyward, probably to increase the billion of dollars to be exacted in higher profits this year from the American people. Meanwhile sugar imports from Cuba exceed the capacity of the refineries.

Mr. President, the humble banana, controlled by the United Fruit Co., with its fleet of 23 ships, has become a kingly profiteer. The net earnings for 15 months, ending December last, equal 40 per cent on fifty millions of stock outstanding, rounding up a surplus for the last 51 months equal to nearly 122 per cent. If ten millions set aside as a war-risk reserve fund are added, the total surplus that the United Fruit Co. has piled up within the last four years would amount to 141 per cent. I leave it to you to judge whether it is an unwarranted or a harsh use of words to call this corporation an unmitigated price pirate and profit gouger.

To be complete, a list of examples in profit extortion would include a great many other corporations in the United States. The few that have been cited and the situation of the people are sufficient to indicate the magnitude of this menace to our efforts to reach sounder and saner times.

We have more than 700,000 tons of meat in the United States, enormous oversupplies of butter, cheese, rice, and other grains and foods, and should be bending every effort to increase consumption, that this plenty be not followed by as great a shortage through slackened production. Speculators have reaped great profits through market inflation, prices are held so high that the people are reducing their standard of living, as reported by the Department of Agriculture, and tons of food held by profiteers until unfit to eat are condemned and destroyed by Government agents.

This is most sordid and wicked folly. For if consumption is not increased instead of lessened, if our wall of prices which compels the bulk of what foreign demand there is to seek South American markets is not lowered, then we may have no-steak weeks in reality instead of by proclamation at no distant day. Our greatest industry—agriculture—tied hand and foot has been made the helpless victim of speculators and profiteers until it must have untrammeled markets and economic freedom if the people of the United States are ever again to be fed on a live-and-let-live basis.

Mr. President, it is wrong to assume, because extravagance flaunts itself in our cities, that plenty exists in all the homes of the land. People who have never known want or privation are living to-day in tents instead of homes; small houses in the big industrial centers shelter two families instead of one; thousands of men, women, and children are compelled to do without necessary shoes and clothing, if not fuel, and certain articles of food—all because the exorbitant prices at which these things are held by those who control them are beyond their means.

The war period has developed several hundred brand-new millionaires in the lumber industry. Back of the car shortage and all other alibis behind which the outrageous profiteering in lumber seeks to mask its insatiable greed is the very strong suspicion that the mills and the supply are controlled and the regulated output doled out to the highest bidder at auction prices. Since July 1, 1919, lumber has advanced from 100 to 200 per cent.

City rent hogs are not satisfied with a 20 per cent return on capital invested, but hold up frantic bidders seeking shelter for all and more than they are able to pay.

Green hides sell at 15 cents a pound in the Southwest but sole leather at $2. First-class packer hides, salted and trimmed, which brought 56 cents a pound in October, now are a drug on the market. But a leading shoe manufacturer, quoted by the Associated Press, says shoes are to be no cheaper for a long, long time. It is still to take the best part, if not all, of the average man's weekly wage to buy a good pair.

When we know these facts, is it strange that we read of mayors, governors, and commissions pursuing rapacious landlords, largely because this Government of the people seems able to do little more for the people than to urge them to eat less and wear less and save their money and buy thrift stamps?

Mr. President, in the name of the peace, progress, prosperity, and welfare of the United States and every one of its people, we must not only demand but must bring about and enforce a nation-wide square deal. It is no one man's job, or nation's. The problem is not ours alone; it is world-wide. And this problem is the working out of a system by which big business may be controlled in such a way as will not impair its efficiency, initiative, and usefulness in serving the people, but which will effectually prevent any exploiting of those its true mission is to serve.

It is time 100 per cent Americanism were defined, so that a perplexed public will fully understand what is meant by the term. If it is 100 per cent Americanism to evade taxes, cheat the Government, and swindle the people, let this be fairly understood. But it would be instructive to be informed just what difference there is in principle between cheating the Government, or putting it in bad, and attempting to undermine and overthrow it in the rude manner of the Bolshevist. Both methods equal the same result, only one is merely more crafty than the other in attaining it.

Mr. President, it is not so much the individual but our present system which is to blame for the conscienceless squeezing of the people for huge profits. To say that this evil can not be controlled is to say that this Government could not make national banks safe when we all know that it has. The Old World found it necessary and has regulated, or relegated, most of its kings. We shall do so with the pirates of the business world. We can regulate profits as we have regulated usury, and in such regulation provision can be made for maintaining a sinking fund for the lean years. The working out of such a system should be the task of the Department of Justice and the Federal Trade Commission, and in performing that task they may well take into consideration all effective steps taken in foreign countries toward beneficially controlling business in the interest of all.

The need of drastic action by governmental agencies in the enforcement of the laws we now have has been increasingly evident for months. We already have laws against profiteering. If those charged with enforcement of these laws will see that the profit hogs are sent to jail, prices will soon tumble. The United States has become a robbers' roost. Greed has become morally and criminally lawless. In self-protection we must find the remedy and apply it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, I have listened with very great interest to the remarks just made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], and I simply want to emphasize one thing that he has said.

We are all constantly receiving protests over nonaction of Congress relative to the cost of living. The fact is that Congress has passed laws that if properly enforced would stop this profiteering; and if one millionaire profiteer were sent to the penitentiary at Leavenworth for a term under the laws that now exist, it would do more to stop this profiteering than all the schemes and all the protests that have been made regarding it.

Why is not this administration enforcing the law that now exists? The fact is that our present Attorney General is setting a few mouse traps around the country where he ought to be setting some bear traps.

Just the other day we read of a little merchant in lower New York who was arrested for profiteering because he had sold an overcoat at 50 per cent profit, and the next morning we read in the New York papers that that little merchant had committed suicide; but we are not reading anything in the newspapers of any action by this administration looking toward the conviction of the big profiteers. Why, take the case of sugar, to which the Senator from Kansas referred. The President refused to exercise the power that he had, that would have controlled the sugar situation, when he might have secured the sugar crop last summer. Last December we passed additional legislation, due to the efforts of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] and the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and the President refused to exercise the power conferred upon him by that legislation, and the result is that we have the sugar situation that exists to-day.

Mr. President, it seems impossible to have this administration even attempt to enforce the laws that would stop this profiteering; and perhaps we shall have to wait a few months longer, until a new administration comes into power that will enforce the laws to correct the conditions that now exist.

But, Mr. President, I intended to say a few words upon the pending question, which is the river and harbor bill.

Mr. President, I am in favor of liberal expenditures for the improvement of rivers and harbors; but those who undertake to say that the $20,000,000 that is provided by the committee in this bill does not take into consideration the needs of the rivers and harbors of this country are mistaken. The fact is that this $20,000,000, with the amount that is now on hand, will permit for the coming year twice the amount of the average expenditures for the past five years; and remember this river and harbor bill is not a bill running from the 1st of July of one year to the 1st of July of the next year. The money is available under this bill when the bill is enacted, and the next river and harbor bill must be enacted before the 4th of next March. So we are not providing for a full year's expenditure under this bill. We are providing for the expenditure only up to the 1st of next March, and this will permit the expenditure, with the unexpended balances, with the amount now on hand, as stated by the Senator from Washington yesterday, of $51,000,000 between now and the 1st of next March, while the average expenditure during the last five fiscal years has been only $26,229,000.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly.

Mr. HARRISON. How does the Senator get the amount he stated—$51,000,000?

Mr. LENROOT. Thirty-one million dollars, the Senator from Washington stated yesterday, is now on hand in unexpended balances, and this bill carries $20,000,000.

Mr. HARRISON. But the Senator from Washington stated that on the 1st of July there would probably be about $12,000,000 on hand. That was as I understood the chairman of the committee.

Mr. LENROOT. No; on these projects, I think.

Mr. HARRISON. He stated that there would be a balance probably of about $12,000,000 at the end of this fiscal year.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Col. Taylor advised the committee that there was $36,000,000 on hand the 1st of February for all projects throughout the country. That is at a rate of expenditure of about five millions a month. So if we spend at that rate up until the 1st of July there will then be on hand out of the $36,000,000 about twelve or thirteen million, and adding twenty million more will make $32,000,000 or $33,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. That will be $32,000,000 from the 1st of July to the 1st of the following March.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. But the chairman of the committee and the Senator from Wisconsin, who is a member of the committee, will agree that the most of that $12,000,000 is contracted for certain specified projects and is to be used on those particular projects.

Mr. LENROOT. Certainly; but that does not affect the amount of money which is being expended for the purpose of river and harbor improvement this year, which I state will be approximately twice as much as the average for the past five years.

Mr. HARRISON. We have been very niggardly in the past five years.

Mr. LENROOT. That may be; but the fact is, Mr. President, that so far as finding the money is concerned to pay for the expenditures of the Government, there was no year during the past five years when the money was not easier found than it is this year. We have never had a time when we have faced so difficult and so desperate a situation with regard to the Treasury. There is a reason for that, and, to say nothing about the profligate extravagances through the war by the administrative officers of the Government, the reason is that there does not seem to be a single member of the administration in its executive side who seems to know that for all practical purposes the war is over, and they are asking for money in every department of the Government without the slightest regard for the interest of the taxpayer or the slightest regard for economy. They are asking, as is well known, in the various appropriation bills for this year more than a billion dollars in excess of what Congress is going to grant to them.

More than that, as is well known, under authority given for war purposes, which it never was dreamed would be exercised after the 11th day of November, 1918, departments of the Government, using that authority given to them for the purpose of prosecuting the war, and because Congress did not believe there would be any abuse of authority to use the power in time of peace, have obligated the Treasury to the extent of millions of dollars, which we have to find the money now to pay for.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator kindly specify what those obligations are?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes. I do not know what it would aggregate, but following the 11th day of November I say that the War Department had no moral right to go into the purchase of land and to make contracts for which the power was given them for the purpose of prosecuting the war.

Mr. REED. To what extent have they done that?

Mr. LENROOT. They have done it in regard to nearly every piece of real estate which the War Department was using during the war. That is a pretty strong statement, and I will modify it. They have done it in many cases where they made a valid contract, where if Congress had been free—and I happened to be a member of a subcommittee considering it—where if Congress had been free it never would have authorized the incurring of those expenditures. But they made valid contracts and we are compelled to find the money to pay for them.

Mr. REED. I am not asking these questions in a controversial spirit.

Mr. LENROOT. I understand.

Mr. REED. But I am interested, now that the Senator has mentioned the War Department. Does he know of other cases outside of the War Department?

Mr. LENROOT. I think there were, not lately but following the armistice, some contracts made by our Shipping Board and Housing Corporation which, in my judgment, ought not to have been made. I am very glad to say that I believe there has been nothing going on of that character by the Shipping Board for the past year.

But I have no doubt, Mr. President, that we are compelled to pay hundreds of millions of dollars out of the Treasury now for expenditures incurred by the various departments of the Government, through powers given them for the purpose of prosecuting the war, where Congress would not have approved the expenditures had it been free to act upon them after the armistice of November 11, 1918.

So we have this condition, Mr. President. The Treasury is in a desperate condition. Where are we going to get the money? It does not seem to occur to some Senators that that is a question which Congress has any concern with. A deficit in the Treasury will face us within the next 12 months, and it behooves every Senator to consider that in connection with these appropriation bills.

That being true, with the $20,000,000 provided by this bill, which will give an expenditure of twice as much as the average expenditure in the past five years, I do not see that those of us who are in favor of liberal appropriations for our rivers and harbors, where they are legitimately required, can have any ground for criticism.

I do not know of any other expenditure in any department of the Government where we are doubling by any appropriation bill the average expenditures during the previous five years. In fact, I think you will find that every other appropriation bill, except this river and harbor bill, has a reduction of expenditures, and this is the only one which provides an increase, when consideration is given to the unexpended balances on hand.

One word more, Mr. President. Much has been said concerning the fact that there are no new projects included in this bill. I agree with what the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] said to-day and the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] said yesterday. I have no doubt whatever that we will spend the money under the $20,000,000 appropriation upon old projects, where there will be very much less benefit to commerce, where there is less urgency for their expenditure, than many new projects which are pending.

The Senator from New York referred to the project at Jamaica Bay. I have one for my own State—Wisconsin—Green Bay, where there is a very great urgency for immediate improvement, where it has been favorably recommended, where the commerce exceeds over a million dollars, and the city is very rapidly growing. But under the policy of the committee no new projects were included.

The fact is, Mr. President, if we would put this whole matter of river and harbor improvements upon a basis which will command the support of the country we must be more careful in the future concerning the merits of each of the particular projects. If we would have the country support Congress in the making of appropriations for river and harbor improvements, we must see to it that where we do spend money there is a reasonable prospect that, from a business standpoint, commerce will float upon the rivers and harbors to such a degree as to warrant the expenditure.

What has given the stigma to river and harbor bills in the past is the fact, and it is a fact, that we have improved little rivers and creeks in various parts of the country where there has never been and never will be any commerce upon them at all commensurate with the cost to the Government.

So, Mr. President, I hope this amendment to the amendment of the committee will be defeated. If the bill remains at $20,000,000 it will provide for all the money which can be safely expended this year in view of the present condition of the Treasury.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I am quite content with the amount of the total appropriations of the bill as reported from the committee. I would have been more content with the bill as passed by the House. I did not rise, however, to comment upon the measure so much as to submit one or two remarks suggested by the criticism of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] of the administration in the Department of Justice as affecting the very popular subject of profiteering.

The Senator informs the country that abundant legislation upon that subject exists upon the statute books, but because of its nonenforcement, or insufficient enforcement, the unfortunate industrial conditions of the time persist. If that is true, it is a very serious indictment. If it is not true, then it should not be permitted to go unchallenged.

There are a number of statutes enacted by Congress designed to punish profiteering, all of them based upon a generally accepted but totally fallacious theory that profiteering can be controlled by legislation and that the prices of commodities can be reduced by controlling the profiteers. I do not hesitate to say, Mr. President, that no more unfounded theory ever prevailed. It is a natural one. It is one which has been acted upon by generations of the past whenever profiteering existed.

The generations that are to come will, under similar conditions, occupy a similar attitude, all of which means that we are largely incapable of learning from history or by experience.

The profiteer is not the cause of high prices. He is a consequence of high prices, and he is so much an essential consequence that at no time in the past, if my reading of history is correct, has he been absent when the opportunity presented itself for his activity. The profiteer flourishes in Germany, England, France, Italy, Belgium, and even in Turkey, as well as in the United States, and an attempt to legislate him out of existence by the operation of punitive statutes has been as abortive there as it is and will be abortive here.

It is true that you can punish an occasional violator of the law; it is true that you can prosecute all of them, or rather the most conspicuous ones; but the profiteer will persist, and always has persisted nevertheless. The public conception of a profiteer is a large, stolid, well-dressed, diamond-bedizened individual, wearing a plug hat and smoking a cigar at an angle of 45 degrees. It is an ideal picture, in other words, of the plethoric millionaire. The profiteer in practice is about as numerous as the members of the American Legion. They differ in amount and in degree, but not in kind.

The association which strikes for inordinate wages, such, for example, as those engineering the strike at present in the city of Butte, Mont., are profiteers pure and simple. Those who demand an inordinate raise of wages or compensation, who take advantage of existing conditions for the purpose of enforcing demands, are profiteers, although the public does not so regard them. Those in the possession of raw material or of food who hold and wait the rise in the market are profiteers as well as those who corner the market and who by so doing commit a crime against the common law and against the statutes of their country.

It is a sort of infectious disease, and very little political capital can be made out of the proposition that one administration fails to enforce laws which, if enforced, would rid the Nation of the difficulty, as is the promise of their enforcement in the event of a change of administration. Nearly all the big so-called profiteers whom I know personally or know of personally are members of the Republican Party. That is no reflection upon them. In some quarters it may be regarded as an advantage, but I imagine, Mr. President, if the next election results in a change of administration and the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] is returned to his seat by his constituency that at the end of that administration the assurance which he a few moments ago gave to the country of what would become of the profiteer in the event that such a happy situation, from his standpoint, will prove as miserable a failure as are the attempts, in the estimation of the Senator, of the present administration in that direction.

I do not believe in profiteering. I want to see the Government punish every man who makes inordinate profit at this time. He ought to be punished, and I care not in what station in life he may be found; I care not what the extent of his profiteering may be, whether it is $10 or $10,000,000; I would like to see it stopped, but surely we ought to reflect—we must ultimately perceive, if we do not reflect at this time—that we are fighting conditions instead of causes and acting very largely like a child who stumbles over a chair and turns around and kicks the chair in his impotent rage as the proximate cause of his injury.

In France during and after the revolution, in England during and after the end of the Napoleonic wars, in France and Germany at the end of the Franco-Prussian War, in America upon the close of the Civil War, these conditions existed. Attempts were made to regulate them in precisely the same way. They failed as these will fail, and we may for political or other reasons on both sides of the Chamber rage against these conditions, indulge in crimination and recrimination, but they will go on. There is but one way and only one way, a hard and rugged one, in which normal conditions will return to this country. It is everybody's business to see that they do return; and if all of the men and women of the country will begin to increase the productivity of the Nation, will by their labors and their exertions contribute to the sum of the results of plentifulness in all the necessaries of life on the one hand, and will live as closely as possible to the line of economy upon the other, automatically the so-called good times will return, and they never will return until we do it, legislation or no legislation, recrimination or no recrimination.

It is a plain, sensible proposition, one which nations in previous times have, sometimes consciously but nearly always unconsciously, recognized in their operations. The present overalls brigade is a beginning. It has some fantastic features, but it is a beginning. If it can only be continued in other lines of necessity, and if in our diet we will assume the same situation, then there will be a change of conditions.

The Senator from Wisconsin talks about the scarcity of sugar. That is deplorable, but the way to have an abundance of sugar is to eat less sugar during these times. Unfortunately the Government itself is and has been setting an example of extravagance that is not at all commendable. I do not agree with the Senator in his criticisms of the departments, who, he says, have been indulging in reckless expenditures since the armistice; that is to say, I do not accept all of his assertions.

The War Department has been compelled to carry out contracts made during the war for lands and for articles supposed to be necessary and which were necessary for war purposes and which contracts they have been unable to cancel upon rational and equitable terms since. They should not be blamed for that. In some instances the War Department has concluded to carry out enterprises which do not address themselves to my notions of expediency, and the same is true of the Navy.

But here again we are against a fact, a stubborn fact, that can not be overlooked. It is that the expenditures consequent upon war always continue in rising proportions for a long period after the war is ended. The Senator from Wisconsin can not name a great struggle in history in which that has not been true. I do not think we have yet reached that necessary peak of expenditures; I hope we have. That we must take into consideration.

But, Mr. President, we have not set the departments a very good example here. The Senator says we are face to face with a great deficiency, and that is true. There is nothing new about it. We knew it a year ago. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] made the statement more than a year ago that July 1, 1920, would find us face to face with a deficiency of over $3,000,000,000, because he knew what our expenditures would be, and what the estimates of the receipts of the Government probably would be. That is true. It must be paid ultimately by taxation.

But in the face of those conditions we have been making unnecessary appropriations, and will continue to do so. Yesterday we passed a bill increasing pensions by $65,000,000, and it created so little interest that there were hardly as many Senators here during the discussion and when it passed as there are in the Chamber at the present time. Congress proposes to listen to the demands of the American Legion and to vote bonuses amounting in all probability to more than $2,000,000,000. Yet in the face of what we have done and what we propose to do, some of us inconsistently rail at the extravagance of other departments of the Government. I think it would be a most wholesome example which Congress ought to set if, recognizing these conditions, we would begin a little economy on our own account.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BALL in the chair). The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HARRISON. The pending amendment is the Reed amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is.

Mr. HARRISON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harrison	McNary	Smith, Ariz.
Borah	Hitchcock	Moses	Smith, Md.
Brandegee	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Spencer
Capper	Jones, Wash.	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Kellogg	Nugent	Thomas
Curtis	Kendrick	Overman	Trammell
Fernald	Knox	Ransdell	Underwood
Gerry	Lenroot	Reed	Warren
Glass	McCumber	Sheppard	Watson
Harris	McKellar	Simmons

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON], the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY], the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], and the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] are absent on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-nine Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The names of the absent Senators were called, and Mr. PAGE and Mr. STERLING answered to their names when called.

Mr. KEYES and Mr. ASHURST entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-three Senators have answered to their names. There is not a quorum present. What is the pleasure of the Senate?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I move that the Sergeant at Arms be directed to request the attendance of absent Senators.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Sergeant at Arms will carry out the order of the Senate.

Mr. DIAL, Mr. WADSWORTH, Mr. FRANCE, Mr. DILLINGHAM, Mr. COMER, Mr. MCCORMICK, and Mr. HENDERSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty Senators have answered to their names. There is a quorum present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED].

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] for a moment. In section 10 of the river and harbor act of March 2, 1919, the Secretary of War was empowered to ascertain whether any contracts for river and harbor improvements have become inequitable and unjust on account of increased cost of materials, labor, and other unforeseen conditions arising out of the war with Germany, and to ascertain and report to Congress for consideration what amounts, if any, in addition to those fixed by the terms of such contracts should in justice and equity be paid to such contractors.

Acting under that provision of the river and harbor act, the various Army engineers throughout the country were called upon by the Secretary of War to give the contracts that were made prior to our entry into the war, the name of the contractor, the subject matter of the contract, the quantities and money valuation at contract prices of the work remaining to be performed after April 6, 1917, a statement of the date of the completion of the work, if completed, and if completed after July 18, 1918, or if not yet completed, whether the contractor has presented any claim under section 8 of the river and harbor act of that date, giving the date of the claim, and, if known, the file number.

Reports covering those details have been made by the Government engineers to the Chief of Engineers and by him transmitted to the Secretary of War. There were quite a number of contracts which were reported as inequitable and unjust because of the increased cost of material and labor after we had entered into the war.

The claims so reported amount in all to $219,916.02. The payment of this amount has been recommended by the Secretary of War or possibly the matter has been submitted to Congress for its consideration.

Amongst other claimants whose contracts were deemed to be inequitable and unjust was Robert Wakefield, of my State, a reputable and honorable citizen, who has done a great deal of Government work. It is recommended that he be paid $11,322.07. I desire to ask the chairman of the committee if the committee has considered this question at all and whether, in his opinion, it ought to be included in the rivers and harbors bill?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I think that if the claims are ready for settlement and payment they should be referred to the regular Appropriations Committee of the Senate. Congress has passed legislation providing for their adjustment, and on a recommendation as to the amount to be paid being submitted to Congress, I think the proper committee for the matter to go to is the Appropriations Committee. That has been the general rule, I know, with reference to claims that may be considered as audited. I do not think that it would be proper to attach such claims on this bill, but, if they are in the shape indicated, they would be very proper items either upon the general deficiency bill or upon the sundry civil bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The matter was considered to some extent, I think, by the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House, but no action was taken.

These claims ought to be paid. They are large enough in some instances to impair the credit and probably to make bankrupt some of these people; and I want to say to the Senator now that while I do not want to encumber this bill with any suggested amendment which will retard its passage, I shall undertake to have an amendment put on the next rivers and harbors bill if we can not get action taken by the Appropriations Committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, there is not any question in my mind but that the Appropriations Committee will give these matters its careful consideration when the appropriation bills come up; but if the claims are sent down in the proper way, I know of no reason why they should not be placed upon appropriation bills if they are found to be correct.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Just a moment. These estimates were sent down by the Secretary of War on the 29th of March, 1920, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, itemized, and giving in detail just what the items were for, and I think the Speaker referred them to the Rivers and Harbors Committee on the other side of the Capitol.

I now yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. NEW. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me for a moment, I merely wish to say that there are at least two concerns in my State that are interested in claims coming exactly within the category described by the Senator from Oregon. They are firms with which I am well acquainted. They are reputable and competent. The conditions were changed for them by the acts of the Government after the time they made their contracts—conditions that were entirely beyond their control, for which they had no responsibility whatever. There is no question in my mind but that they have a just claim against the Government. It is a question, I suppose, of where and how that claim should be presented.

As I understand, the Senator from Washington does not contest the validity of the claims at all. As the Senator from Oregon has stated, they have gone to the Secretary of War after having passed the inspection of the Engineer Department and received their approval. The Secretary of War has approved them, and has given that approval in a formal way in a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Possibly a mistake has been made at some point along the line in presenting the claims in this bill; but, whether in this or some other bill, the claims ought to be adjudicated. I think they should be allowed; and if the Senator from Oregon has an amendment to propose, and will include in that amendment the companies of which I speak, and whose cases come exactly within the description he has given, I shall be very glad to support it, unless there can be some sort of understanding that they will have the consideration to which they are certainly entitled on some other bill.

I think myself it is possible that the proper place for them is on the general deficiency bill. I am not disposed to in any way interfere with the passage of this bill if this is not the proper place for these claims, but it is certainly true that they are entitled to consideration.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, several Senators have spoken to me about claims of this character, and I suppose they are probably covered in the letter that the Senator from Oregon has—the Senator from Minnesota, the Senator from Michigan, Mr. TOWNSEND, I think the Senator from Tennessee, Mr. MCKELLAR, and probably other Senators. I have told them that in my judgment these claims should go to the Appropriations Committee to have their amount carried in an appropriation bill.

I will say to the Senator from Indiana and to the Senator from Oregon that if it is found that these claims are not in a position to be taken care of in an appropriation bill, if further legislation is necessary in order that they may be presented to Congress in the proper form, I shall be glad for the River and Harbor Committee—if that is the proper committee, and I think it would be—to look into the matter and to do it in the next bill; but I am very strongly of the opinion that if these estimates have come down in the proper form, in compliance with the law that we passed, under which, as I understand, these claims were to be audited and the amount due to be fixed, they can be properly taken care of in an appropriation bill.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. JONES of Washington. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is entirely correct, except in one particular—that it is not a finding of liability by the department. They recommend to Congress what in their judgment should be the amount to be paid.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That may be true. Then it would be for the Appropriations Committee, I take it, to pass upon that.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I do not know the exact language of these claims; but the place for them, if they have reached the proper point, is on a deficiency bill, of course. I am very careful about promising beforehand what can go on a bill, because we sometimes have to meet very urgent opposition on the other side; but I do say that it is my desire always, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to take care in the deficiency bill of everything that has arrived at the proper stage and is in proper shape to go on that bill. I believe in sweeping up clean every time.

We have pending a deficiency bill which is right here on my desk, but that is of a special nature. It is only a matter of a very few items; but before the end of this session there will follow a general deficiency bill. Whether or not these matters offered by the Senator from Oregon are in shape to be submitted as audited claims I am unable to say; but I can give the assurance that it is my intention, as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, to clean up everything that confronts that committee to the day we report that is proper to be contained in a deficiency bill. These items seem to be in the nature of a deficiency, if they have passed the proper examination, and, of course, we will then have behind them, or should have, the further proof, if any is necessary.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, these claims always have my sympathy, because a man may have a claim of a few hundred dollars against the Government of the United States, and it may be accepted by the proper tribunals, but they play battledore and shuttlecock with it when it gets here, and it is sometimes a physical impossibility ever to get it through.

Take these claims. They all grow out of river and harbor construction. There is not any question about their validity or their justice. The distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee, as he intimated a while ago, has always been fair in the consideration of these matters, but I greatly fear that when this one comes up to the committee he will find quite a number of Senators on the committee who will say, "Oh, that ought to go in a claims bill," and the Claims Committee may not think it ought to consider it, with the result that, unless some committee will take it and fairly consider it as it deserves to be considered these claims will be hanging for a long while.

I have not undertaken to impede the progress of this river and harbor bill; in fact, I want it to go through; but I do express the hope as to all of these people, although each individual claim is small, that the Committee on Appropriations will take up the matter, because it has been reported in all respects as the act of 1919 provides.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. I merely want to say that I do not believe in any event there would be any possible warrant for saying that any of these matters should go to the Claims Committee. They are only claims against the Government by virtue of legislation we passed in the last river and harbor bill, and every one of them is audited and the amount fixed in the report made to Congress, so there can be nothing for the Committee on Claims to find.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I hope the Senator is right, and I do not think myself that it ought to go there. I think the Committee on Appropriations can dispose of it finally.

Mr. LENROOT. I think so.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] a few questions about the pending amendment.

As I understand, the bill reported from the committee carries an appropriation of $20,000,000. The amendment offered by the Senator from Missouri increases that amount to $27,000,000. I am especially interested, not only as a citizen of Virginia but also as a great friend of the Navy, in the improvements at Norfolk Harbor.

Norfolk Harbor, with Hampton Roads, is becoming one of the industrial and commercial centers of this country. In recent years, next to New York, it is getting to be the greatest import and export port of the entire country.

The railroads that center there, I believe, will ultimately make Chesapeake Bay the industrial, commercial, and manufacturing center of this country. Baltimore is interested in it, and thousands and thousands of industries on Chesapeake Bay. The roads that center at Norfolk extend from the far West, Kansas City, St. Louis, and the Great Lakes. In addition to that, we have built at Norfolk, impelled by the necessities of the occasion, the greatest naval base and shipyard anywhere, in which we are now constructing the very largest ships. It requires a depth of 40 feet for ships to go to the dry docks, on which the Government has spent a great deal of money, and this 40-foot depth must have a certain breadth to enable these ships to come in.

I understand that the original recommendation was for the appropriation of $750,000 to complete that work satisfactorily, not only for the commerce of that port but also to enable the dry docks and battleships being constructed there to be properly utilized. I understand that that was reduced to $400,000, which is all that will be obtained unless this amendment prevails; and I understand that if this amendment prevails there will be money available to complete that great work at Norfolk. With an appropriation of $27,000,000, would there be available the $750,000 which they have been insisting is absolutely necessary for Norfolk Harbor?

Mr. JONES of Washington. They do not insist that $750,000 is absolutely necessary. The revised estimate of the engineers places the amount at $400,000. They have on hand for Norfolk Harbor $813,766. With the $400,000 they would have over a million two hundred thousand dollars, and the engineer placed in his revised estimate $400,000 for Norfolk Harbor.

Mr. SWANSON. I understand that.

Mr. JONES of Washington. He says in his letter, in answer to my letter, that they should have $400,000. That would be taken care of in the $20,000,000. Of course, if we appropriate $27,000,000, they could expend more there; or they might take that money and put it into other projects. They are not required to put it in any particular place.

Mr. SWANSON. I understood the estimate originally was for $750,000, and the Senator wrote a letter asking them if they could not reduce it to something less. As I understand, the money on hand now was for something that has already been appropriated for, and it will complete that work; but the channel must be made broader in order that ships, especially battleships, may come in and out, so they can be dry-docked.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That is what the engineers say in their letter in answer to my letter.

Mr. SWANSON. That the $400,000 might enable them to continue the work for a reasonable time, but that they certainly could not do that work for less than $750,000. That is based possibly on an idea that there might be a deficiency appropriation bill after the elections are over.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No, Mr. President. I regret such suggestions with reference to political expediency, and so forth. I know that has had nothing to do with the consideration of this bill in the Commerce Committee of the Senate, and I have not considered it for one moment. This is the idea, that we will have another river and harbor bill by the 4th of next March.

Mr. SWANSON. It will not be operative, though, until the 30th of June.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; the appropriations in river and harbor bills are always immediately available. That is largely the basis upon which Col. Taylor acted in reducing a great many of these amounts. He expressly states in his testimony that we will have a river and harbor bill by the 4th of next March, because that is the time the present Congress ends. He says $400,000, with the $830,000 on hand, will take care of Norfolk Harbor.

Mr. SWANSON. Up until the 4th of March?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SWANSON. But he admits that he could not do this work so that the battleships could go in the dry docks and be launched, after completion, unless he gets $750,000, does he not?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; he does not say that.

Mr. SWANSON. That is the substance of what he has written, as I have gathered it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; he says in his letter to me——

Mr. SWANSON. That is, when you wrote asking him to reduce the amount from $750,000 to $400,000?

Mr. JONES of Washington. No; when I wrote him asking whether Norfolk Harbor could be omitted entirely. The appropriation recommended by Col. Taylor's memorandum is $750,000. The original estimates give it as a million dollars, but possibly that was wrong. He says:

> The entire omission of this item is suggested in your letter. The project for the improvement of this harbor provides in its main feature for a channel 40 feet in depth to the navy yard. The Navy Department has recently completed, it is understood, a dry dock at the head of this channel capable of receiving the largest ships, and the entire capacity of the project channel is necessary for the proper utilization of this dry dock. With the available funds and under existing contracts, it is expected to secure a channel 40 feet in depth, but the width of this channel is insufficient for its proper utilization. The vigorous prosecution of the work of enlarging the channel is considered highly essential. The funds on hand are insufficient to undertake this enlargement, and the omission of the item presented would be highly inadvisable.

The revised estimate, as I said, was placed at $400,000. Col. Taylor, according to my recollection, in his testimony before the House committee, just as he did with reference to several reductions which he had made, based it upon the idea that we would have another bill by the 1st of March; in other words, that the appropriation is not for a whole year, but for three-quarters of a year, and he expects the additional amount to be available, and with this $1,200,000 he can carry on the work. Of course, if the amount carried by the bill should be increased to $27,000,000, and that should become a law, then there would be more money available for Norfolk Harbor and more money available for other various harbors in the country. Of course, that is true. If we should raise it to $40,000,000 there would be more money for not only Norfolk Harbor but for many other harbors and rivers throughout the country. The same argument that has been used against the twenty million in this bill can be used also against the twenty-seven million; in other words, the amendment providing for $27,000,000, I take it, is proposed instead of one for forty or fifty million because it was thought that that was about the best that could be gotten. The $20,000,000 recommended by the Commerce Committee is not all that several of the members of the committee would like to have. It is more than some think we are really justified in appropriating for at this time, but it is the amount which the majority of the committee felt we really ought to have in order to meet imperative needs. I believe that that amount will pretty well take care of the situation.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the appropriation of $20,000,000 is conditioned on the idea that Congress must certainly pass a river and harbor bill before the 4th of March. Experience has taught me that at the short sessions very rarely do we get a river and harbor bill through, unless we make tremendous concessions. Senators can, if they wish, filibuster up to the 4th of March.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Will the Senator permit me?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator will remember that some seven or eight years or more ago the policy was adopted of having a river and harbor bill at every regular session, and my recollection is that since that policy was adopted we have not failed to have a river and harbor bill at each session.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, that is true; but on account of the shortness of the session, and owing to the fact that half a dozen or a dozen Senators can filibuster and prevent the passage of any bill unless we surrender everything to suit their demands, it is nearly impossible to get through a good, satisfactory bill suitable to the commerce of the country at a short session. If we were satisfied that we could get through a river and harbor bill at the short session of Congress to take care of this enterprise, which is absolutely necessary, not only for the country but acknowledged by the Army Engineers to be indispensable for the Navy to provide for the great battleships which are being constructed there, and for the docking of these immense ships, it would be well to let it go over, but I am satisfied that when we come here at the short session, if we get a bill through it will mean a surrender on all these appropriations, and it will be nearly impossible to take care of these enterprises. Having had experience in the House and the Senate, I am satisfied that when the chairman of the committee is here at the next session, about the 2d of March, when the appropriation bill comes up, and it is known that there will be a filibuster for two or three days, you will get nothing except something that five or six Senators who, very illiberal and ungenerous in promoting the commerce of this country, agree to; and we shall have to make concessions and surrender to them. In view of that condition I think it is wise at this time to increase the appropriation to $27,000,000.

There is not a man who will claim that it would be a waste. The very men who advocate $20,000,000 will admit that you can not do this work for 12 months unless you get a bill through before the 4th of March to carry on the work from the 4th of March to the 30th of June. I am not familiar with any of these projects except that in connection with Norfolk Harbor. I do know about that. I know it is a great port. I know it is the second port in the United States. I know its commerce is growing by leaps and bounds. I know it is crowded. I know it is the greatest naval base in the world. I know they have prepared it as a place for docking the great ships. The Army and Navy insisted upon it, and it seems to me it is wise at this time to make this appropriation of $27,000,000. I shall vote for the amendment to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I wish to suggest that if we are not going to have a river and harbor bill at the next session, I doubt very much if Norfolk will get anything of the additional sum. There will be so many other projects throughout the country which will want it divided up that there will be nothing left for that harbor.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. KENDRICK (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and vote "yea."

Mr. MOSES (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Louisiana [Mr. GAY]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER] and vote "nay."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. SHIELDS] and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KIRBY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is absent on account of illness. I transfer that pair to the Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and permit my vote to stand.

Mr. BALL. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] and vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. DILLINGHAM (after having voted in the negative). May I inquire if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] has voted?

The VICE PRESIDENT. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. DILLINGHAM. I transfer my general pair with the Senator from Maryland [Mr. SMITH] to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. PHIPPS] and allow my vote to stand.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer the pair to the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-three Senators have answered to the roll call. There is not a quorum present.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, it seems to be impossible to get a quorum this afternoon. I therefore move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, April 26, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

SENATE.

MONDAY, April 26, 1920.

Rev. John Paul Tyler, of the city of Washington, offered the following prayer:

Let us pray. Almighty God, father of life and of mercies, giver of every good and perfect gift, command upon us, we beseech Thee, Thy blessing as we enter upon the activities of another day and another week. Bless us in all that we shall do or say. Enlighten our minds with Thy wisdom, that with unselfish devotion to Thy righteousness in the earth through our lives and labors Thy kingdom may come. Forgive us our blindness and our selfishness. Help us to see and to do Thy will.

Let Thy blessing rest upon our native land, we pray, upon the President of our United States, upon all the Members of this Congress, upon the loved ones in homes, wherever they are. Keep them, protect, shield, and direct them. Guide us by Thy counsel, and afterwards receive us into glory. For we ask it in the name of our Lord and Savior, who taught us when we pray to say:

Our Father who art in heaven, hallowed be Thy name. Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done, on earth as it is in heaven. Give us this day our daily bread, and forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us. Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil, for Thine is the kingdom, the power, and the glory forever. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of Friday, April 23, 1920, when, on request of Mr. CURTIS and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with, and the Journal was approved.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The roll will be called.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	McKellar	Simmons
Borah	Harrison	McLean	Smith, Ariz.
Calder	Henderson	McNary	Smith, Md.
Capper	Hitchcock	Moses	Smoot
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Nelson	Spencer

France	Knox	Phipps	Wadsworth
Gay	Lenroot	Pittman	Warren
Gerry	Lodge	Ransdell
Glass	McCormick	Reed
Gronna	McCumber	Sheppard

Mr. GRONNA. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is absent due to illness. I ask that this announcement may stand for the day.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to announce that the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] is detained at a meeting of the subcommittee of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the junior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. DIAL], the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

COMMISSIONED OFFICERS AS CIVILIAN EMPLOYEES (S. DOC. NO. 173, PT. 3).

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting, in response to resolution of December 11, 1919, a statement showing the name, rank, and total compensation of all officers in the War Department who, at the time they were commissioned, were employed by the civil branch of the Government and the compensation such officers were receiving as civil employees at the time they were commissioned, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and ordered to be printed.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, during the debate upon the Army reorganization bill I made some remarks concerning the sending of untrained soldiers to the front. I have a letter from the Secretary of War in which he has taken exceptions to some of the statements that I made. I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD this letter together with my reply to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 15, 1920.

Hon. IRVINE L. LENROOT,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: On pages 5537 and 5538 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of April 12, 1920, there appears the following extract from a speech delivered by you on that day:

"The murder of these boys—because it was murder—was not due to the failure to enact a policy of universal military training prior to our entry into the war. It was due wholly, as every officer who touched upon the subject has testified, to the fact that division commanders in the camps of this country, who had trained men in abundance, when they were called upon for replacements, instead of those commanders sending their trained men they sent from those camps men who had never received an hour's training, and kept their trained men in the camps in this country."

I realize that in the heat of debate upon the floor of the Senate there must inevitably occur statements which, in some cases, convey most undeserved censure of those who are unable to properly reply or defend themselves before the bar of public opinion. This realization is, I believe, shared by the public, as well as the Members of Congress, and for that reason no attempt is made in many cases to call attention to these unfair criticisms. The above remarks, however, reflect so seriously upon officers of high rank, who conscientiously did their best to forward the interests of the country at large, that I feel I should call the matter to your attention.

I do not question Col. Donovan's statement made before your committee, that at one time he unfortunately received a detachment of men who had not completed the prescribed course of training. In operations of the magnitude that we were conducting at that time, it is possible that through some miscarriage of plans such a situation might have arisen. This, however, I assure you, was not the case generally, and I feel certain that an occurrence of this nature was most rare.

As to how this particular situation arose, there seems to be no competent evidence. Col. Donovan himself, in explaining it, assumed a hypothetical reason which he thought might have existed, and clearly stated in this connection that he did not know this to be the case. In reality, this method of replacement was used at only one time, and involved but four divisions. The instructions governing this movement included the following:

"All men selected for Infantry, Field Artillery, and Cavalry will be men with the usual oversea qualifications, and, if possible, men who have had target practice and at least two months' training."

There is nothing in the records to indicate that these instructions were not carried out in the spirit in which they were issued. It would appear, therefore, that your general indictment of the division commanders of the camps in this country has not the foundation upon which such grave charges should have been based. I rely upon your sense of justice for a correction of the false impression, the perpetuation of which, I feel sure, you would not desire.

Cordially, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

APRIL 21, 1920.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I have yours of the 15th instant relative to remarks made by me in the Senate on April 12, 1920. In reply, I will say that in the language quoted by you I had no intention of charging that all division commanders adopted the practice of filling replacement quotas with untrained men, and I do not think the language would carry that idea. I, of course, had no intention of making any such sweeping charge. The fact remains, however, that there was testimony in abundance to the effect that untrained men were sent to the front, and this has been corroborated by many ex-service men in private conversation with me. I do not believe that all division commanders were guilty of this charge, but that some were guilty the testimony abundantly shows.

Permit me to say that in my opinion there was no time while we were engaged in war when there was the slightest excuse for sending any boy who had had no training whatever across the seas where he might be sent to the front to fight. The instructions quoted by you of themselves seem to leave some discretion in this regard with division commanders. You quote as follows:

"All men selected for Infantry, Field Artillery, and Cavalry will be men with the usual oversea qualifications and, if possible, men who have had target practice and at least two months' training."

I can not see why, so far as "two months' training" is concerned, there should have been any discretion whatever left with division commanders, but even with this discretion there could be no excuse for any division commander sending untrained men.

It seems to me a thorough investigation should be made by you of this matter; and if any division commander is found to have sent untrained men for replacement when he had trained men who might have been sent, he should be court-martialed.

I, of course, have no desire to cast any reflection upon division commanders who were not guilty of this practice, and I therefore shall be very glad to insert in the RECORD at the first opportunity your letter to me and this reply.

Very sincerely, yours,

I. L. LENROOT.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA. I present a very brief letter and resolution from the Fargo (N. Dak.) Trades and Labor Assembly, which I ask to have printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FARGO, N. DAK., April 21, 1920.

Hon. A. J. GRONNA,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The inclosed resolution was read and indorsed by the Fargo Trades and Labor Assembly at our meeting last Wednesday, and I am instructed to forward same to you and ask your support of the bills called for in the resolution.

Thanking you for past favors, and in the hope that your support will be forthcoming, we remain,

Sincerely,

FARGO TRADES AND LABOR ASSEMBLY,
By W. G. BESSERER, Secretary.

Whereas the signing of the peace treaty finds in American civil and military prisons, or under bail pending trial or appeal, large numbers of men and women whose offense or alleged offense is of a political nature; and

Whereas the sole justification for such prosecution and imprisonment, that of war-time necessity, no longer exists; and

Whereas in all democratic countries of Europe which have been associated with us in the prosecution of the war full amnesty has been granted to all political, industrial, and religious war opponents: Be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of our organization that further prosecution and imprisonment in the United States of a body of political offenders is contrary to the democratic idealism and the traditions of freedom to which our country is committed; and be it further

Resolved, That we accordingly urge upon the United States Senators and Congressmen of our State to do all in their power to support Senator FRANCE's joint resolution, S. J. Res. 171, for amnesty, and S. 1833, to repeal the espionage law. With all earnestness at our command we urge the necessity of granting an immediate amnesty to all prisoners whose religious, political, or economic beliefs formed the basis of their prosecution, trial, and imprisonment.

FARGO TRADES AND LABOR ASSEMBLY.

Mr. CAPPER presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Eureka, Kans., and a petition of sundry postal employees of Independence, Kans., praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. MOSES presented a memorial of the American Society of Landscape Architects, remonstrating against the enactment of legislation granting certain irrigation easements in the Yellowstone National Park, which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. PHELAN presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Santa Rosa, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation providing a more simplified method of collecting taxes, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland presented a petition of sundry citizens of Talbot County, Md., praying for the establishment of a Bureau of Education, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of the Federation of Labor, of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the deportation of aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a petition of Fred W. Beaudry Post, No. 126, American Legion, Department of Michigan, of Detroit, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation authorizing the purchase of artificial limbs from the nearest representative of the Public Health Service instead of through the authorities at the city of Washington, which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

He also presented petitions of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Wyandotte; of the Association of Commerce of Wyandotte; and of Local Lodge No. 199, Boiler Makers, Ship Builders, and Helpers of America, of Wyandotte, all in the State of Michigan, praying for an increase in the salaries of postal employees, which were ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Grand Rapids, Mich., praying for the parole of Federal prisoners, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Rotary Club of Sault Ste. Marie, Mich., praying for the enactment of legislation for nation-wide promotion of physical education in the United States, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also presented a memorial of the Ernest Kern Co., of Detroit, Mich., and a memorial of the Seelye & Brown Co., of Detroit, Mich., remonstrating against the proposed increase in the tax on all forms of advertising, which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13138) to amend section 8 of an act entitled "An act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes," approved October 15, 1914, as amended May 15, 1916, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred bill (S. 4273) to amend an act entitled "An act to amend section 1, chapter 209, of the United States Statutes at Large, volume 27, entitled 'An act providing when plaintiff may sue as a poor person and when counsel shall be assigned by the court,' and to provide for the prosecution of writs of error and appeals in forma pauperis, and for other purposes," approved June 25, 1910 (36 Stat., p. 866), reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 546) thereon.

Mr. SPENCER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3251) granting longevity pay from and including August 5, 1917, to certain officers and enlisted men, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 547) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 4287) for the relief of James M. Kelly (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Claims.

A bill (S. 4288) granting an increase of pension to Elevse Fightner (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4289) granting a pension to Thomas George Maginnis (with accompanying papers);

A bill (S. 4290) granting an increase of pension to Joseph E. Burkhart (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4291) granting an increase of pension to Abram Robinson (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 4292) granting a pension to Clint T. Littlefield; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SHIELDS:

A bill (S. 4293) granting a pension to Margaret Howell Butler;

A bill (S. 4294) granting an increase of pension to Robert O. Dunn (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4295) granting an increase of pension to Delia B. Zell (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

DUTIES ON IMPORTS.

Mr. DILLINGHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. 10918) to provide revenue and encourage domestic industries by the elimination, through the assessment of special duties, of unfair foreign competition, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

HEIRS OF JOSHUA NICHOLLS.

Mr. DIAL submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 190) for the relief of Elizabeth R. Nicholls and Joanna L. Nicholls, heirs of Joshua Nicholls, which was referred to the Committee on Claims and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 12 o'clock and 10 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed, and the calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed with the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment is the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the committee amendment. It will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, strike out "$20,000,000" and insert "$27,000,000," so as to read:

That the sum of $27,000,000 be, and the same hereby is, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury, not otherwise appropriated—

And so forth.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] to the amendment of the committee.

The Reading Clerk called the roll.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have a general pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. GLASS (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN], which I transfer to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY], and will permit my vote to stand.

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE], and vote "yea."

Mr. WATSON. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT], which I transfer to the Senator from Washington [Mr. POINDEXTER], and vote "nay."

Mr. BALL. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER]. I understand he has not voted, so I withhold my vote.

Mr. LODGE. I have a general pair with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and vote "nay."

Mr. FERNALD. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. That Senator being absent, I transfer my pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. TOWNSEND (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], which I transfer to the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS], and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN], the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and the Senator from Nevada [Mr. HENDERSON] are absent on official business.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] with the Senator from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. STERLING] with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]; and

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY].

The result was announced—yeas 26, nays 28, as follows:

YEAS—26.

Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Smith, Ariz.
Comer	Kendrick	Overman	Smith, Md.
Culberson	Knox	Pittman	Spencer
Gay	McCormick	Ransdell	Swanson
Glass	McKellar	Reed	Trammell

NOT VOTING—42.

Ashurst	Frelinghuysen	Newberry	Smith, S. C.
Ball	Gore	Norris	Stanley
Beckham	Hale	Owen	Sterling
Brandegee	Harding	Penrose	Thomas
Colt	Henderson	Phelan	Underwood
Cummins	Hitchcock	Poindexter	Walsh, Mass.

Edge	Johnson, S. Dak.	Robinson	Williams
Elkins	Kenyon	Sherman	Wolcott
Fall	Kirby	Shields
Fletcher	La Follette	Smith, Ga.

So Mr. REED'S amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on page 1, line 3, I move to amend the amendment reported by the committee by striking out "$20,000,000" and inserting "$24,000,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Mississippi will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 1, line 3, it is moved to strike out "$20,000,000," the sum which it is proposed to increase the appropriation by the Committee on Commerce, and to insert in lieu thereof "$24,000,000."

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I have offered this amendment, in the first place, because the amount proposed is needed to carry on river and harbor improvements; and, in the second place, the Engineers' Department of the Government in their recommendations have stated that they can not with a less sum than that properly take care of the rivers and harbors of the country. I quote from the report of the Senate committee as follows:

> The Engineers were told to go over the revised list of projects very carefully with a view to giving us the very lowest sum that they could get along with without detriment to existing commercial needs—

This was after their first estimate of $43,000,000—

> They went over the projects carefully and insisted that $24,000,000 ($5,000,000 for maintenance and $19,000,000 for improvement) was the lowest sum they felt they could get along with.

In view of that recommendation of the Board of Army Engineers I can not understand how anyone who believes that the rivers and harbors of the country should be taken care of can vote against the amendment which I have proposed. In my opinion, the pending river and harbor bill is not only an indictment of the majority of the Senate and of the other House, but it is a confession of their incompetence and inability adequately to provide for the domestic needs of the country.

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in his speech on Saturday last, among other things, stated:

> The fact is that this $20,000,000, with the amount that is now on hand, will permit for the coming year twice the amount of the average expenditures for the past five years.

That statement is misleading. It is not a fact that the $20,000,000 proposed to be appropriated, together with the amount which will be available on July 1, will equal the average of river and harbor expenditures for the last five years. As shown by the report of the Senate Committee on Commerce, the amounts that have been expended for the past five years on river and harbor improvements are as follows: In 1915, $36,682,913.27; in 1916, $28,779,995.40; in 1917, $23,829,265.46; in 1918, $20,613,905.46; and in 1919, $21,245,177.

Senators know that during the war we economized on the river and harbor bill and cut it to the bone more than any other appropriation bill passed by Congress. For the years immediately preceding the war the appropriations for river and harbor improvements were as follows: In 1914 we appropriated $51,000,000; in 1913, $41,000,000; in 1912, $30,883,000; in 1911, $49,000,000; and in 1908, $43,000,000.

It is stated by those who oppose adequate appropriations for rivers and harbors that $12,000,000 will be carried over as a surplus on the 30th of June of this year. I am told—and the chairman of the Committee on Commerce states it is a fact—that that is no more than the amount that has been carried over from prior river and harbor bills. I am told this morning by Col. Taylor, of the Engineer Corps, that it is probably less than the amount that was carried over during the five years immediately preceding the war. So those who oppose the increase of the appropriation in the river and harbor bill must oppose it because of the reasons advanced by the House Rivers and Harbors Committee. Here is the excuse that the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House has given to the country for appropriating merely $12,000,000 this year. They say in their report:

> The plan adopted in this bill will allow the Secretary of War to allot funds to the different works when and as the maintenance work is needed, and it is expected that the annual amount appropriated under this plan in the future will be considerably below former appropriations in amount and that a sufficient unallotted fund will be available from this appropriation at all times to prosecute emergency work at any locality when it becomes necessary.

That was evidently why the House of Representatives supported the Rivers and Harbors Committee of the House in only providing an appropriation of $12,000,000 for river and harbor improvements. They arrived at that figure not on the theory that it would take care of the rivers and harbors of the country, that it would provide sufficient funds to dig out the channels so that commerce might flow into and depart from our ports at all times, but they based their action on the theory that it would be sufficient "at all times to prosecute emergency work at any locality when it becomes necessary."

When has it become necessary for Congress merely to appropriate a sufficient sum of money for rivers and harbors to take care of emergency work when the necessity arises? Our policy has been for years to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to take care of the needs of trade and commerce by the improvement of our rivers and harbors not in emergency times but at all times during the year.

Following the action of the House, the Senate Commerce Committee recommended an appropriation of only $20,000,000. They were not following the expert advice of the Board of Army Engineers; but they appropriated $20,000,000 simply because they did not think they would be able to get more money than that. That is the reason for their recommendation. Those in the Senate Commerce Committee who opposed increasing the appropriation beyond $20,000,000 knew that more money was needed to take care of the rivers and harbors, but they were afraid they would never be able to compromise with the House, and that it might become necessary to agree to the House appropriation of $12,000,000 even if every river and every harbor in this country should suffer during the coming year as they have suffered during the past five years.

Some days ago the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER] stated the question correctly when he said that a dollar to-day on river and harbor work will accomplish about 40 per cent of what a dollar would accomplish five years ago; in other words, the $20,000,000 appropriated by this bill will go no further than $8,000,000 would have gone five years ago. Taking those figures, if we should agree to the House appropriation of $12,000,000, in actual results accomplished it would be equal only to an appropriation of about $5,000,000 five years ago. I can not believe that the Senate of the United States desires to cripple the rivers and harbors of this country in any such fashion as that.

We have not economized on other bills. The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT], in his speech on Saturday, told us how we had cut down appropriations for this and that. The Senator forgot that the last year preceding the war, before we got into the war, for Army purposes we appropriated approximately only $100,000,000, and that for the Navy we appropriated approximately $150,000,000.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator was comparing the appropriations for last year with the appropriations for this year, and the Senator stated that this was the only appropriation bill that was increased so far as he was advised.

Mr. HARRISON. Oh, yes; if the Senator wants to take as a comparison what we did during the war, when everyone knows and will concede that abnormal appropriations were made to take care of abnormal conditions; but I understood the Senator to say—and I am glad to receive the correction—that before the war we reduced the appropriations; that that was one of the achievements of the Republican Party; that it had reduced all appropriations for other purposes; and that this was only in line with that.

While we appropriated $101,000,000 for the Army before the war—in 1915, I believe—the Army bill this year will carry approximately $350,000,000; perhaps more, but certainly no less than that. I understand that the Naval Affairs Committee will bring in, or has brought in, a bill that will carry approximately $550,000,000 for the Navy. Before the war we had never appropriated over $160,000,000 at any time for the Navy; and so this species of Republican economy is the kind that increases the Army appropriations threefold, that increases the Navy appropriations fourfold, and reduces appropriations for the rivers and harbors of the country over one-half.

That is false economy. You are only trying to fool the American people about it; but I am wondering what the citizens of New York, who are interested in the commerce that flows from their harbor, think about it. I am wondering what the people in Connecticut, who are interested in their rivers and in their harbors, are thinking about it. I am wondering what the people in New Jersey, who ship and export millions of dollars' worth of products from their harbors, are going to think about the votes of their Senators in a measly appropriation that would destroy river and harbor improvement. I am wondering what the people in Michigan are going to think of the votes of their Senators when they see they are voting for $20,000,000, as against an increase to $27,000,000 or $24,000,000, when, as stated by the Senator from New York [Mr. CALDER], a dollar to-day will go no further than $2.50 would have gone practically five years ago. The Senator shakes his head, but I understood the Senator to say that $20,000,000 to-day for river and harbor improvement would go about as far as $8,000,000 would have gone five years ago.

Mr. CALDER. The Senator stated it the wrong way a moment ago; that is all.

Mr. HARRISON. Well, the Senator understands what I am getting at.

Mr. CALDER. Perfectly. The Senator is perfectly right in his last statement.

Mr. HARRISON. Absolutely. So, when the Rivers and Harbors Committee come in with an estimate of $43,000,000 for the rivers and harbors of the country and state that they have cut the amount to the bone, even then, I say, Senators who know that that amount will take care of only 40 per cent of what it would have taken care of five years ago vote to reduce it to $20,000,000.

So I am of the opinion that the people back home who are interested in their river improvement, who are interested in their harbors being improved, who for four or five years during the war have seen their dredge boats lying idle and rusting, who have seen expenditures of money made when no work was being done, because of the inadequate appropriations, are going to ask the reason why their particular Senator or Representative did not vote with us to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to do their work, so that the trade and commerce of the country might continue to grow.

The senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] in his very able and aggressive speech on last Saturday told the Senate how last month our exports had gone forward at a greater increase than ever before in the history of the country. If that is true—and it is true—and we want to see our exports continue to grow larger, we ought to make reasonable appropriations to take care of the harbors through which and in which the ships for which we have appropriated such large sums may come. I was looking at the appropriations for our merchant marine and I see that the startling figure of $3,000,000,000 was appropriated to obtain a merchant marine. Is it statesmanship, is it good common sense to spend $3,000,000,000 of the people's money in providing for a merchant marine and then refuse to appropriate a sufficient amount of money to dredge our harbors in order that these ships may come and go? That is a short-sighted policy, Senators, and yet that is what we have done in the past few years.

I saw the Senate pass a railroad bill. I voted against it. I am glad I voted against it. I am prouder now than ever before of the fact that I voted against it, because I saw in the consideration of that bill where the Treasury of the United States was being drained, millions and hundreds of millions of dollars handed over to the railroads, the people taxed proportionately, and then I saw the authority granted in that bill that the railroads might be guaranteed a certain percentage on their investment, and the power there granted that the people might be taxed in order that those railroads might obtain that particular percentage. I saw you take care of the railroads by burdening the tax bearers of this country in making possible higher freight rates. I see you now withholding this appropriation that will help the rivers and the harbors that they may compete with the same railroads that you befriended.

If you want to help the people, give them cheap transportation. You can not do it by allowing the rivers to fill up, by not having the harbors dredged, and at the same time giving subsidies to the railroads of the country.

This Congress has been liberal with the railroads. It has been liberal in providing money for the highways of the country. We appropriated, I think, $75,000,000 to be used in cooperation with the States for that purpose, but when it comes to following the suggestion of the Army Board of Engineers to improve the rivers and the harbors of the country—the natural highways—that boats may ply to and fro on them, that people may obtain cheaper freight rates, that competition may ensue between them and the railroads, then I see the Republican majority suddenly become very economical, very stingy, and try to follow the House majority in appropriating a measly $20,000,000 for this work.

Why, you do not believe that you will be able to get even that much in conference with the House, do you? You are figuring on cutting even that amount. That should be no concern of ours. Let the Representatives in the other body answer to their constituents for the inadequate appropriation of $12,000,000 that they made, but let us answer to our constituents. Let us try to take care of the needs of this country. Let us look at this new day in the proper light. Let us take advantage of the great opportunities that are now being offered to us. As we have been niggardly for the past five years in withholding adequate appropriations for our harbors and for our rivers, let us at least now, in this dawn of an industrial awakening, appropriate at least a reasonable amount in order that these harbors that have suffered so long may be adequately taken care of.

No one can charge you with extravagance when you vote for this amendment to raise the amount from $20,000,000 to $24,000,000, because the Board of Engineers say that they can not get along with less than that. They estimated for $43,000,000, and I can not understand the reasoning of the Committee on Commerce, in view of the recommendation of the Board of Army Engineers, in cutting the amount from $24,000,000 to $20,000,000.

It has been charged that this is a "pork-barrel" bill. I have heard that assertion ever since I came to Congress, and long before; but I lay it down as an indisputable proposition that no bill that passes Congress is subjected to such close scrutiny and given such consideration as are the river and harbor appropriations. We come in with our bill for naval appropriations. Those appropriations are sometimes inserted in the bill at the instance of some individual member of the Naval Affairs Committee of the Senate. They come in with estimates at other times of the Secretary of the Navy; but there is no board, such as the Board of Army Engineers, composed of experts, studying nothing but that kind of work, a board which passes on it and must give their O. K. for it.

You pass your Army appropriation bill on estimates prepared by some man in the War Department. Often amendments or provisions are inserted at the instance of some Senator or Representative. They do not receive the same close scrutiny and careful consideration that is given to the provisions incorporated in the river and harbor appropriation bill.

No appropriation bills go through the same careful consideration and investigation which river and harbor appropriations receive. Not only do we rely on the work of the committee which drafts the bill, but we rely also on the O. K. of the Board of Army Engineers; aye, we go further than that, because before they put their O. K. on it each provision is O. K'd by the local engineer officer, by the district engineer officer, and while in the past there may have been some little project that would subject itself to criticism and should not have been incorporated in the bill, in the great majority of cases, the overwhelming majority of cases, have been those which showed wisdom upon the part of Congress in making the appropriation.

So, I submit that at this time, when the war is over and we are starting out in trying to obtain for this country our part of the trade and commerce of the world, when we have a merchant marine we are all proud of, let us not stint ourselves. Let us not play politics because some may live away back in a place where there is no river and no harbor, aye, not even a creek, and we can go back to that particular constituency and say that we cut down the river and harbor bill to $20,000,000.

I suggest to those Senators who come from localities where river and harbor improvement is needed and where it has been withheld throughout the war, to help us in securing the adoption of this amendment, which will insure us at least $24,000,000 for this year.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, I wish to say just a few words in support of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], and am very sorry that it did not pass.

I wish to call the attention of Senators to the report of the very able and fair-minded chairman of the Committee on Commerce [Mr. JONES of Washington]. I am sure he has done everything a chairman in his very difficult position could do. I would like to have Senators look at the first page of his report. He shows, in the first place, that the estimates made for river and harbor improvements by the engineers amounted to $42,000,000. Who are these engineers, Senators? Are they interested parties? By no means. They were the honor men at West Point, the men who reached the highest position in their respective classes at West Point. They are high officers of the Army; men entitled to retire with good pay at the age of 64; men sent from one place in the country to another, rarely ever kept more than three years in one place, entirely free from entanglements and local interests of any kind. If there be a disinterested, able body of men in the public service, it is in the Corps of Engineers of the United States Army, who are charged, among other duties, with making recommendations for expenditures on works of river and harbor improvement and with using the money given to them.

That is the class of men who made the original estimate of $42,000,000 for carrying on, in a fairly reasonable manner, all the work on the rivers and harbors of the country, including Porto Rico, Alaska, and Hawaii. It is a small sum when one considers the vast interests involved. We understand that they were requested by the House of Representatives to cut their estimate to the bone, to cut it down to the irreducible minimum, the very last dollar with which they could get along; and, as shown by the report of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, page 1, the department was asked to reduce its estimates as much as possible. It submitted a revised estimate calling for about $22,000,000 for improvement and five million for maintenance; $27,000,000 in all; which they thought was the last dollar they could get along with, and that was the sum which the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] sought to have adopted by his amendment to raise the amount carried in the Senate committee's bill from $20,000,000 to $27,000,000.

That amendment was voted down by a majority of two. The present amendment proposes to give $24,000,000 for all these rivers and harbors, increasing the sum suggested by the Senate committee from $20,000,000 to $24,000,000, an addition of $4,000,000.

What does the chairman of the committee say about that? His report reads:

> Your committee hoped that it might feel justified in approving the amount as it came from the House. We are in hearty accord with the desire to meet the need for economy. The Engineers—

What engineers? The United States Army Engineers, not the local engineers at New York City, or Boston, or Philadelphia, or Norfolk, or New Orleans, or San Francisco, or Seattle, no men with local interests to subserve, but great Engineers of the Army, who are not tied to any locality, are not dependent for their living upon whether the amount appropriated is $20,000,000 or $24,000,000, who receive their salaries entirely regardless of what Congress does in the matter, and who are perfectly disinterested men.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator about what proportion of the money appropriated in the bill goes to harbors as contradistinguished from river improvement?

Mr. RANSDELL. In answer to the Senator's question, I will state that the bill as framed does not provide how the money shall be expended. It is a lump-sum appropriation of $20,000,000, to be used by the engineers in whatever manner they deem best for promoting the commerce of the entire Nation on waterway projects which have already been formally adopted and approved by Congress, the work on which is now under way.

On page 2 of the report of the committee will be found a list of the active projects, with the estimates originally made by the engineers, aggregating $42,000,000, and then a revised estimate. I have gone over the latter, and, as well as I can estimate, would say that about three-fourths of the money which the engineers propose to expend out of whatever sum is given them will be used on the harbors of the country. Something like one-fourth will be used in improving the rivers. Far the greater portion will go on the harbors, and those harbors are in every part of the country.

Those harbors, Mr. President, are absolutely needed to develop the wonderful foreign and domestic commerce of the Nation, through the aid of the great merchant marine just alluded to by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], on which we have appropriated about $3,000,000,000. It is absolutely necessary to improve those harbors and do so promptly.

Recently on the South Atlantic coast lines of ships have been started by the Shipping Board, sailing out of several harbors, and they are doing satisfactory business. At many harbors on the Great Lakes, at many harbors on the Atlantic, the Gulf, and the Pacific there is a rapidly growing commerce, and nearly all of them need improvement. If we do not give the engineers the $24,000,000, the irreducible minimum which they have asked, in my judgment they will be bound to neglect work on a great many of the big harbors.

Let me allude to one with which I am quite familiar—the Southwest Pass of the Mississippi River, in my own State. Making up estimates for the bill as the engineers do ordinarily, suggesting what they thought should be expended, they proposed in the original estimate that Congress should give $2,191,000 for carrying on the work at Southwest Pass. When they were told to cut the estimate down to the very last dollar, they suggested for the Southwest Pass $1,600,000. If you are going to further cut the total appropriation from $24,000,000 to $20,000,000, and then if the conferees, as I fear, are going to further yield to the House and make the appropriation $15,000,000 or $18,000,000, how is the Southwest Pass going to fare? It is not possible to give Southwest Pass $1,600,000 out of $20,000,000 unless a number of other projects are eliminated.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. In one moment I will yield. The engineers may possibly do it, but, if so, they will have to completely eliminate several other important projects. I yield to the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. LENROOT. Has the Senator observed that in the letter from Col. Taylor, under date of April 5, upon a basis of $18,000,000—not $20,000,000—they propose to give to Southwest Pass the full amount of $1,600,000?

Mr. RANSDELL. I read that letter, and I believe I know something about human nature. As able as these engineers are, as sincere as they are, I believe I know what they are going to do when we give them $20,000,000 or $18,000,000 and tell them that out of that sum they must take care of every waterway in America, and the Senator from Wisconsin, the Senator from Missouri, and Senators from other States press before them in the strongest manner, insisting that they do something for the projects in their respective States. It will be almost impossible to resist such appeals. Congress does not command them to spend $1,600,000 of this $20,000,000 on Southwest Pass. Congress, if the bill is passed as now before us, says, "Do the best you can with the total appropriation." They say, of course, that they would endeavor to expend $1,600,000 on Southwest Pass if they get but $18,000,000. It is one of the most important projects. But can I, as a Senator from the State of Louisiana, stand here asking for appropriations for the great harbor of my State and consent, even if it gets what it is entitled to, that the others shall be cut out? No; that will never be my position. I am willing to stand or fall with the other meritorious waterways, rivers, and harbors of the country. If the others which are included in this estimate, and the others which go to make up the irreducible minimum of the $27,000,000, can not receive what they are entitled to, then I am willing that my harbor shall not receive what it is entitled to.

There is nothing in that thought that is improper. Mind you, we are not approving any new projects in the bill. We are not saying that so much shall be expended in one place and so much in another. We are giving a lump sum to the engineers and telling them to do the very best they can with it. They tell us that they can not get along in anything like a reasonable manner with less than $27,000,000. Yet the House comes in first and says, "You know a great deal more about it than we do. We practically know nothing. You are the doctors, you are the men whose duty it is to give us the information. Yet after you prescribe at our request we are not going to give even one-half of the minimum that you need," because the $12,000,000 which the House gave is not one-half of $27,000,000.

Then the Senate comes along and, with the same information which the House had, raises the amount to $20,000,000. Why did we not raise it to $27,000,000, or at least to $24,000,000, because Col. Taylor in some testimony did indicate that possibly if the maintenance item and the prosecution of the work item were included in one lump sum, not dividing them as the House had done, he might be able to save between $2,000,000 and $3,000,000, and in that way it was finally gotten down to $24,000,000?

Why should we, Senators, cut down on such an important matter as that in a Congress which will appropriate, before we get through, between $3,500,000,000 and $4,000,000,000? We are doing this for transportation. We paid out of the Nation's money for railroad transportation, to help them along, and did it with my hearty approval, nearly a billion dollars. We are giving the railroads several hundred million dollars right now to help them along and I am willing to vote it. I am willing to vote every dollar which our Committees on Commerce and Interstate Commerce say is necessary to keep the transportation agencies of the country moving.

We do not stop at a paltry $20,000,000 or $24,000,000 to keep the railroads moving. The waterways are another branch of our mighty transportation system. We must do what is necessary to keep them in proper condition to do business. Do we want some of our great ports to be blockaded because the engineers have not the money to dredge out the channels? It seems to me it would be horrible if the splendid ships that have been built at such enormous cost should fail to enter any of our ports because the channels had filled up. We must keep everything going on in a reasonable and proper way.

I was one of those who were anxious to see a liberal river and harbor bill passed at this time. I was anxious to see some new projects taken on, put under way, and prosecuted vigorously, but I realize the needs of the Treasury. I do not wish to see one single dollar appropriated unless it is absolutely necessary. I do not ask you to take my judgment or the judgment of any Member of the Senate; I simply ask you to take the judgment of the Corps of Engineers, who for over 100 years have been in charge of all these works and who have told us as disinterested experts that the very least they can get along with is $24,000,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

Mr. RANSDELL. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. KELLOGG. Will the Senator tell the Senate, even with the present taxes, where the Government is going to get the money to pay the estimated expenses for the next fiscal year?

Mr. RANSDELL. I will say to the Senator that I am not an expert on finances. That duty devolves, I take it, upon the Finance Committee of the Senate. But I will say to the Senator, as I have already said, that this Congress is appropriating well on to $4,000,000,000 for carrying on the affairs of the greatest Nation on earth. I will say further to the Senator that the appropriation carried in the bill is to make our colossal foreign commerce available—to make it successful.

What would happen to the Mississippi Valley, for instance—not only to the State of Louisiana but to the whole Mississippi Valley—if because of a failure to improve the mouth of the Mississippi River ships were unable to enter the port at New Orleans, a port which now, in the volume and the value of its exports and imports, is second only to New York? That would be a very serious calamity to the Nation—not to Louisiana alone—and it might readily happen. One ordinary-size ship sinking in South Pass would so block the channel that it would be months, probably, before ships could come in if the other entrance—the Southwest Pass—is not open. The work on Southwest Pass is being prosecuted. The engineers desire $2,192,000 to prosecute the work on Southwest Pass. They say they can get along somehow with $1,600,000. Suppose you give them but a million dollars for this purpose—suppose the bill is finally cut down to $15,000,000 or $16,000,000 and they can not possibly get more than $1,000,000 for Southwest Pass—what, then, is going to happen to the commerce of our Nation?

It would be a very serious matter, it seems to me, for the commercial interests of that great section of the upper Mississippi Valley which the Senator from Minnesota represents so ably if they are unable to ship their commerce, their manufactured articles of every kind and sort, through the port of New Orleans, thence through the Panama Canal to the Orient, and the western coast of South America, and the east and west coasts of North America, and to Central America, and the West Indies. It would be a very great calamity, I repeat, to the entire Mississippi Valley.

In a Congress, Mr. President, which is appropriating well on to $4,000,000,000, if not quite $4,000,000,000, I say that the item of $24,000,000 for improving the transportation facilities of the country is a mere bagatelle. I say it is unwise, unbusinesslike, to quibble on the small sum of $4,000,000, only one-tenth of 1 per cent of the appropriations of this Congress. That is all the amendment asks. I sincerely hope, sir, that the Senate will vote in favor of the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I am in favor of river and harbor appropriations to take care of the necessary commerce of the country. I voted with the committee because it seemed to me from the presentation made by the committee that the country would get along very well this year with $20,000,000. I shall not vote, of course, to reduce that sum. I believe the sum appropriated by the House was too small.

I realize the great importance of the waterways of the country reaching to the great interior fertile valley, but when I hear Senators appealing to the Senate to increase appropriations, as did the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], I think we would better pause and consider what is confronting the country. The Senator says we will appropriate $4,000,000,000 this year. Why, Mr. President, the entire income of the Government, under the present rate of taxation, is $6,000,000,000. The estimates of the departments for the operating expenses of the Government for the year 1921, from July 1, are about the same sum, $6,000,000,000; and the deficit from last year is $3,000,000,000. In addition to that, there are certain losses which have been reported by the Director General of the Railroad Administration, amounting to something like $400,000,000 or $500,000,000; and there are other items which I will not stop to designate, due to increase of salaries, wages, and so forth. The estimates will bring the Government expenditures for next year to $10,000,000,000.

The Senator talks about liberal appropriations to the railroads. They have been liberal to pay the losses of the last two years, which now the Director General admits are $1,000,000,000, and which I will assure the Senate will amount to $1,200,000,000 before the bills are paid.

We talk about losses, of course, due to the enormous expenses of the Shipping Corporation. Why charge a Republican Congress with them, as does the Senator from Mississippi? Who made the appropriations and who spent the money? Is it fair to say that a Republican Congress did it? Not at all.

The Senator speaks about the expenditures for the Army. The Secretary of War called upon the Congress with an estimate of $1,100,000,000 for the Army. I am informed that the Army bill as it passed the House and the Senate will carry an appropriation of about $375,000,000 to $425,000,000. I assure Senators that if they would stop and consider this subject, they are going to see that it is necessary to cut the expenditures of the Government somewhere, everywhere that it can be done.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. The Senator from Minnesota voted for the Army bill, I think.

Mr. KELLOGG. I did vote for the Army bill.

Mr. REED. And the Senator knows the estimates contained in that bill were about $600,000,000. Does not the Senator think that we had better take a little off the Army to carry on the internal commerce of the country?

Mr. KELLOGG. Possibly that might be done; but I voted for the Army bill because I believed that at this time it was not wise to reduce the Army below the estimate of the committee, which, I think, was for an Army of 280,000.

Mr. REED. I desire to ask the Senator another question, if he will permit me. Because of the congested condition at our eastern ports during the war, we had to, or, at least, whether we had to or not, we did, stop the operation of all factories east of the Ohio River for 14 days. The economic loss resulting from that action is estimated by some as high as $6,000,000,000. Does the Senator think that, if we are preparing for future possible war conditions, it would be well to have some additional means of transportation developed and some ports opened up to relieve conditions in this country in case of such a catastrophe as another war?

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I certainly wish to be liberal in the matter of river and harbor improvements. I will say, however, to the Senator that the stopping of the factories in this country, in my judgment, was the greatest piece of folly that ever a meddling fuel director or any other kind of a director perpetrated upon a country. It was in line with trying to run all the business with a director general in Washington, which can not be done. I think the Senator will agree with me as to that.

I read this morning in the newspapers a statement of Mr. McAdoo calling on Congress to reduce taxes. That is a very easy statement to make in a newspaper when one is a candidate for President and not responsible for the voting of the money which is necessary to pay the expenses of the Government; but most of the losses of the railroads were due to Mr. McAdoo and his system of administration, concentrated in Washington.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator bear in mind the fact that Mr. McAdoo's letter was addressed to the farmers, and that he particularly proposed to reduce taxes to them and to put the burden on somebody else? Does not the Senator also know that political exigencies account for many curiosities in the way of ideas?

Mr. KELLOGG. I am quite aware of that, I will say to the Senator from Missouri, but such statements are not statesmanlike; they are political.

I wish to see the tax system changed and the taxes reduced as fast as possible; but, Mr. President, before taxes are reduced we have got to reduce expenditures; and the country should realize that fact. Taxes can not be reduced, as Mr. McAdoo the other day recommended, by borrowing money and continuing to sell bonds. We already have a bonded debt of $25,000,000,000, and Government bonds can not be sold to-day on a basis of less than 5 per cent.

Mr. McKELLAR. Will the Senator from Minnesota yield to me?

Mr. KELLOGG. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Does the Senator think that we can reduce taxes by instituting in this country a military system three times as expensive as German militarism ever was?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I do not think anything of the kind, Mr. President.

Mr. McKELLAR. I am glad to know it.

Mr. KELLOGG. I am anxious, of course, that the great commerce of the country shall be taken care of; I believe that the continuance of our export business, which last year amounted to more than $6,000,000,000, is necessary to the prosperity of this country, which is a large surplus-producing Nation; but, Mr. President, the Committee on Commerce has stated in its report that $20,000,000 will fairly take care of the rivers and harbors for the next year. In view of that fact, I voted with the committee, because I realize the absolute necessity for retrenchment in all branches of the Government.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I hope the Senator from Minnesota will not go out of the Chamber for a minute. I want to talk about a matter in which I think he is particularly interested.

The commerce on the upper Mississippi River, by which I mean that stretch of the river from St. Louis to Minneapolis, has practically ceased to exist. It has ceased to exist chiefly because the railroads made the same kind of war upon boats on the river that they made on each other. It was a common thing for railroads in the old days—and I am not saying this to drag up old and unpleasant memories, but simply because it is a fact of history—it was a common thing for railroads in the old days to undertake to destroy each other. The Senator from Minnesota knows that, because he has had a wide experience in investigating some of those questions. Rates would be reduced for no other purpose than to destroy a weak rival, the stronger roads being able to stand a reduction and the weaker not, with the result that the weaker road would find its stocks and securities depreciated; it would be thrown into bankruptcy, and would be absorbed or controlled.

The same kind of war, as the Senator knows, was made upon river traffic. The result was that boat lines being owned by small companies could be easily crushed. A single season deprived of profitable business, and those boats were ready to be tied up to the wharves and sold or sent into other waters. In some instances the railroads even purchased the boats, so that river transportation was destroyed. The railroads would reduce rates during the summer months, for instance, when the boats were active, and then raise the rates during the winter months and make the loss back when the boats could not operate. That was a system which went or for many years. Finally the wharves were allowed to decay, the boats were gone, and the railroads had the field to themselves.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. REED. Yes; although I am leading up to a matter to which I desire to call the Senator's attention.

Mr. KELLOGG. I merely wish to make the suggestion to the Senator that those conditions were taken into consideration in connection with the railroad bill recently enacted, and the Interstate Commerce Commission was given jurisdiction so that it may protect the water lines.

Mr. REED. Exactly; the Senator has anticipated what I was about to say.

We kept on with the foolish policy of permitting the railroads to operate in the manner of which I have spoken, killing off water transportation and then killing off their own rivals. The wharves disappeared; the facilities by which goods could be taken from a river, even if transported on a boat, ceased to exist; and if any boat happening to survive this warfare hauled goods no railroad would interchange rates with it or interchange freight with it. It was a condition where a part of the public transportation service of the country was destroying another part of the public transportation service of the country. That, everybody will agree, was unwise, improvident, and wasteful.

At last we arrived at a condition where public warfare on the railroads, conducted, I think, frequently without proper judgment, resulted in the railroads ceasing to improve themselves. Public warfare, plus financial buccaneering, plus bad railroad management, and plus all of the conditions to which I have referred, brought about a condition where it was stated by Mr. Hill, the great railroad builder, and by other eminent railroad authorities that the railroads were 10 years or more behind the necessities of the country. So when we entered the recent war we found that transportation, the most vital thing during a war except the mere matter of men at the front, was in a desperate condition. Without going into details, we know that the harbors of the East were congested, that the railroads were incapable of carrying the business of the country, and that the economic loss to the country was incalculable. A small percentage of that economic loss would have made every important stream in the United States navigable; it would have rebuilt the wharves in all the principal cities; it would have opened the ports of the South and have expanded the ports of the East and of the West. Capitalized, it would maintain those ports and rivers forever. On top of that, we have annually or semiannually flood losses, nearly any one of which far exceeds the total appropriation for rivers carried by this bill.

With these conditions confronting us during the war the Government undertook to put lines of boats upon the Mississippi River and upon the Warrior River. It also undertook to organize certain lines of transportation and to place boats upon certain canals. When it began that project the Government found itself confronted with the same shortage of materials that the business of the country had to contend with, so that while it started in with the expectation of having these boats completed within a few months, the Government was unable to accomplish the task. Nevertheless orders for boats of a character and of a power heretofore unprecedented were given. On the upper Mississippi River a line of boats was projected to carry freight from Minneapolis to St. Louis and from St. Louis on to the Gulf, where the freight that went as far as the Gulf could, if destined to the ports of the world, be loaded upon ocean-going craft.

The line of boats which was ordered for service upon the upper Mississippi directly concerns the great State of Minnesota; it is vital to the development of the two wonderful cities of the Senator's State, a State that he loves and that he wants to see developed. I think I have here in a condensed statement the facts concerning that projected line of boats. Contracts were entered into for the construction of 19 steel barges and 4 steel-hull towboats for the upper Mississippi.

On April 1, 1920, 14 of these barges had been launched, 4 were under construction on the ways, and the material for the remaining 1 was being collected.

The average completion of all the barges was 88.64 per cent. While they had been launched, they had not been completed.

The barges will cost approximately $110,000 each, and will carry, fully loaded, on a draft of 7 feet, 2,000 tons each.

One of the barges constructed by the Marietta Manufacturing Co. and one by the Dubuque Boat & Boiler Works were delivered in the fall of 1919, and towed by a self-propelled river dredge from St. Paul to St. Louis, each loaded with 650 tons of ore. The boats on this trip drew approximately 4 feet of water and the towboat 4½ feet. The trip was made without special difficulty or incident.

I am reading from a report made to me by the War Department.

These are the barges, but they had not yet one of their towboats.

The towboats are being constructed under a joint contract entered into by the Marietta Manufacturing Co., the Minneapolis Steel & Machinery Co., and the St. Louis Boat & Engineering Co. The cost of these towboats, including the contract work, designs, drawings, and so forth, to be furnished by the United States, will be approximately $375,000 each. These boats have approximately 1,800 horsepower, and will draw 4½ feet of water when in service.

On April 1 the work on these boats was approximately 15 per cent completed. The contract calls for the delivery of the first boat April 27, 1920; the second June 6, 1920; the third July 16, 1920; and the fourth August 25, 1920. On account of the delays which have been experienced by severe winter conditions, inability to obtain materials, and difficulties with labor the contract work on these boats has been greatly delayed, and they will not be completed until nearly the end of the season of 1920, if, indeed, they are completed at all during the present season; but undoubtedly the entire fleet of 4 towboats and 19 barges will be available for service in the spring of 1921.

The towboats are modern, up-to-date boats of unusual power, and the barges have been especially designed for easy towing and handling in shallow channels; and the one experiment which has been made with the barges indicated that they were correctly designed to accomplish the purpose intended.

I am reading from Mr. Taylor's statement.

Here are the boats actually in process of construction to connect the Senator's great State, with its immense tonnage, with the lower Mississippi, to afford a cheap means of hauling the ores to steel factories located in the Mississippi Valley, to afford direct transportation for the wheat and flour and other products of the great State of Minnesota to southern ports, where they can be reshipped for European and other ports, especially for the oriental countries. I want to say to the Senator that I have examined this bill with the greatest care, and I give it to him as my deliberate judgment that if this bill is passed at less than $27,000,000 not one dollar of the money in addition to that which has been previously absolutely appropriated will be spent upon the upper Mississippi River.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. KELLOGG. I understood from the chairman of the committee—it was publicly stated here—that with the $20,000,000 of appropriation there would be available for the upper Mississippi $1,200,000, for the lower Mississippi $500,000, and for the Missouri River $600,000, and that this would fairly take care of what it was necessary to do during the coming year.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I have heard those figures, but I can not understand where the chairman of the committee gets them. The Board of Engineers made their estimate. They put in items for these rivers, and they made an aggregate estimate of $27,000,000 as the last reduction they could make.

Then the chairman of the committee wrote to the Chief of Engineers a letter, which the Senator from Minnesota will find on page 4 of the report, in which he asked him if they could not omit certain items. Among these items to be omitted or reduced was the Mississippi River and the Missouri River to St. Paul, reduced to $600,000.

I do not know what that means. There is some mistake in that term, "Mississippi River and Missouri River to St. Paul," for, of course, the Missouri River does not run to St. Paul.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Missouri yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. REED. I do.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I see the engineers describe it that way in their estimate. It means, of course, the stretch of the Mississippi from St. Louis to St. Paul. I do not know myself why they include the word "Missouri" in it, but they do.

Mr. KELLOGG. It evidently means "Mississippi, Missouri River to St. Paul."

Mr. REED. It means, I think, the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Missouri to St. Paul, $600,000.

Mr. KELLOGG. It reads "$1,200,000."

Mr. REED. But I am reading from the Senator's letter.

Mr. KELLOGG. Oh!

Mr. REED. The Chief of Engineers reported back that certain of these items could not be cut at all, and that certain items could be cut a certain amount if they had to do it. The item of the Mississippi River from the mouth of the Mississippi to St. Paul is not in the items to which I have just referred, but must be covered by paragraph 14 of the letter, which reads:

> The omission of the remaining items will delay the prosecution of important and worthy improvements, but will not have the serious consequences incident to the omission of the items on which the above statements have been made.

So the best I can get out of the situation is that the engineers may hope to use $600,000 on the upper stretch of the Mississippi River.

I had a talk with Col. Taylor, who said to me that the increased cost of work, of labor, and of everything had made such a condition that he could not say that these projects could be carried on with the $20,000,000 that is proposed here; that, of course, the Board of Engineers would do the very best they could. So, as I look at it, these projects which the Board of Engineers have certified as the more important, as the imperative projects, will be taken care of. The projects which are covered by paragraph 14 of the answer to the letter of the chairman of the committee will be the ones to suffer. That means the Mississippi River, among others. It is against that that I protest, and I hope the Senator can be induced to join in the protest, and therefore I address him.

The Senator has said that the Interstate Commerce Commission is now empowered to protect river transportation. I hope it will exercise that power.

Recently those who were in charge of river transportation, either present or potential, have succeeded in getting joint water and rail rates established, and that was done at many points during governmental control. Wharves are being built all along this river by the cities which are located on the river. With the joint rates, with modern wharves being constructed, with a boat line in process of construction, we are now engaged in passing a bill which in all human probability will result in nothing of importance being done upon the Mississippi River. That work must and will languish.

I appreciate the Senator's argument in favor of economy. I am as much in favor of economy as others. But let us look at this question of economy. An army eats every day, and it produces nothing. It is necessary; it is not to be condemned; it is not to be starved; but it is that character of expense which when the money is once employed it is gone forever. The spending of money to open the Mississippi River probably means a benefit to the Senator's own State and to his own city in one year more than the entire cost of improving that stream. Yet we propose to throttle these improvements which, in their blessings to the people, bring back tenfold every dollar expended and at the same time, without a blush, we vote an army of 300,000 men, to cost $600,000,000.

You had better cut a regiment or two off that Army and fix up the highways of this country, even if you are dealing with the proposition as a war proposition, for if we ever engage in another war the fact that we have the great inland waterways of this country open to transportation is of more value than 100,000 men armed and ready for conflict, for you can not keep an army at the front unless you can feed them, and you can not feed an army unless you have transportation.

I wanted to offer those observations to the Senator from Minnesota. While we see men whose States border upon these great inland streams throwing dollars out with a scoop shovel for armies and navies and the payment of bonuses; when we decide that we can pay a thousand millions of dollars to the railroads, and, as the Senator states, $500,000,000 on top of that, that we can carry these enormous burdens, the water pouring out of the funnel, I find some modern economists busy holding their fingers on the spigot. It is not wise. Twice on Saturday my amendment raising the amount of the bill to $27,000,000 received a majority vote, but was defeated because of the lack of a quorum.

Mr. President, there is not any use in my carrying on this discussion in the absence of Senators. I am not particularly anxious to have anybody hear me, but there are only four Senators present, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Harris	Moses	Smith, Md.
Calder	Harrison	Nelson	Smoot
Capper	Henderson	New	Spencer
Chamberlain	Jones, N. Mex.	Nugent	Sterling
Curtis	Jones, Wash.	Phelan	Sutherland
Dial	Kellogg	Pittman	Thomas
Dillingham	Kendrick	Ransdell	Trammell
France	Keyes	Reed	Warren.
Gay	King	Sheppard
Gronna	Lenroot	Simmons
Hale	McKellar	Smith, Ariz.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Forty-one Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is not present. The names of the absent Senators will be called.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. OVERMAN, Mr. PAGE, and Mr. WADSWORTH entered the Chamber and answered to their names when called.

Mr. KNOX, Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. SWANSON, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. GLASS, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. BORAH, Mr. LODGE, Mr. MCLEAN, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. CULBERSON entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-five Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senators from Kansas, from Iowa, from Minnesota, and other States of the interior of the country that under former rulings of the Interstate Commerce Commission potential water competition was used in the matter of rate making. The result was that the Missouri River was a basing point where the rates were made on the same basis as though there were actual water competition on that river and on the Mississippi River. The new railroad act, I understand, changes that rule, and the basing of rates now is upon actual water transportation. I would like to have the attention of the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER], for I want to know that he understands this point. Of course, when he has heard it stated he will form his own conclusion.

If I am correct in my construction of the new railroad act, and boats are not put on those rivers, the basing point for rates, with water transportation considered as an element, will no longer obtain at the Missouri River and the Mississippi River points, and the basing point will be at Chicago. If that is done, every farmer in Kansas will pay for it, every business man in Kansas will pay for it, and every laborer in Kansas will pay for it. What is true of Kansas will be true of Iowa and will be true of the Dakotas, and will be true of the vast country drained by the Mississippi and the Missouri Rivers. This is the year when river transportation will be saved or killed.

These boats, as I have shown, are in process of construction. When we come to another river and barbor bill, if transportation on the river has not been successful, it will be stated as conclusive evidence that river transportation is a failure. The question will never be asked, or if asked will be without effect, Why was the failure? Was it because there were bars across the streams or was it because they are really unnavigable? We will be met by the same old argument that we have confronted here for years, that there is no great amount of business done upon these waters, although every man who will stop to think knows that there can not be business done upon a water highway or a railway until the waterway has been so improved that boats can travel or the railroad has been so built that cars can run over it.

Now, at the very crucial time it is proposed to cut this appropriation bill to a point where it is perfectly certain that these rivers will receive no benefits, no improvement of consequence, and the boats which we are about to build and which have cost over $7,000,000 will be obliged to run over sand bars and through snags and over rapids and other obstructions to commerce. We sit here in the great interior of this country twiddling our thumbs and counting dollars on this proposition as though they were millions of dollars, and then shoveling out millions of dollars for a vast army that will cost $600,000,000 if it costs a cent, voting away money here for a civil pension list that will run into hundreds of millions or thousands of millions of dollars before we are through with it, and voting away money to the railroads.

Let me say there is not a railroad influence in the United States that is not being exerted now to kill off water transportation, and it is just as active to-day as it has ever been.

If Senators, with these facts before them, see fit to destroy the chance of their own section of the country—and I am referring to that vast section drained by the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers—let them do so, but let them do so with their eyes open and with full knowledge of the facts. The bill was designed in the House to be the end of river improvements of this land.

I see the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] standing here. I observe a clause in one of the reports, or in a letter which I have from the Engineering Department, that the engineers desired to make improvements so as to open certain waters in Texas, but that they do not get it, and can not get it, under this bill.

I say this final word to the Senators from the great central parts of the country, the most fertile domain there is in all the world of arable lands, a domain cut off from the sea and dependent upon railroads alone, unless these rivers are improved. You never had as good an opportunity to serve your country and your people as you have by seeing to it that these great rivers which the Lord created in our country are again made the carriers of mighty commerce.

Some gentlemen somewhere—of course, not here, for we never have any politics here; we are entirely above that—may think it is good politics. They may think they can go out into their States and say, "The Democrats appropriated $25,000,000 or $30,000,000 for the rivers and harbors of this country and, behold, we appropriated only $12,000,000." They may think that that will gain some votes in this campaign. I say to you that the issue will be so infinitesimal in this campaign, and the saving will be so small, compared with the vast aggregate of the appropriations, that your argument will have no more effect than a fly speck on the Pennsylvania Railroad track has upon the fast express that pushes on over it and does not know it is there.

But your people will awaken ultimately to the fact that they do not have water transportation. Your people will awaken ultimately to the fact that somebody sat down here in Congress and made it impossible to put boats on those streams, and that every farmer who ships grain or produce of any kind, everyone who is engaged in merchandising, the vast consuming public, has paid the freight and that the aggregate of that freight is a burden many times more than the taxes would have been.

Sooner or later in this country, instead of thinking of foreign lands and sending our dollars six or seven thousand miles from here to be expended by peoples centuries older than we are, yet slothful and retrograding and inefficient, incapable either of caring for themselves or caring for anybody else, the day will come when a policy will be inaugurated in this country to develop the country for the benefit of this people.

I showed the other day, from the figures of a great engineer—and they are backed by the Army engineers—that in the Mississippi Valley alone there are 20,000,000 acres of the most wonderful land ever created, subject to overflow, perpetually kept in a condition of swamp, and that all this land can be reclaimed.

We are talking about homes for soldiers. Where will we put them? Where will those homes be acquired? An empire of waste land or partially waste land is at our door; an empire, according to the estimates of great experts, that is capable of supporting a population five times as great as that which was supported in the Valley of the Nile in the days of the Pharaohs, and we allow this waste to go on, and call it economy to let it go on.

The day is coming in this country when political parties are going to be proud to carry out the pledges of the past, and both political parties are pledged to this policy. In platform after platform they have solemnly asserted to the public that they will carry out these improvements. I have the platforms here. Of course, they may not be binding upon anybody. I know the day has come when political platforms are treated as scraps of paper, but here is the Republican platform of 1912:

> The Mississippi River is the Nation's drainage ditch. Its flood waters, gathered from 31 States, constitute an overpowering force which breaks the levees and pours its torrents over many millions of acres of the richest land in the Union, stopping mails, impeding commerce, and causing great loss of life and property. These floods are national in scope and the disasters they produce affect the general welfare. The States unaided can not cope with this giant problem, hence we believe the Federal Government should assume a fair proportion of the burden of its control, so as to prevent the disasters from recurring floods.

The Progressive platform of 1912—I suppose that party does not exist to-day, but at least many of its adherents exist—declares:

It is a national obligation to develop our rivers, and especially the Mississippi, without delay under a comprehensive general plan. Under such a plan the destructive floods of the Mississippi would be controlled and land sufficient to support millions of people will be reclaimed.

What said the Democratic platform of 1912?

We hold the control of the Mississippi River is a national problem; the building of the levees to prevent overflow of the land and its consequent devastation resulting in the interruption of interstate commerce, the disorganization of the mail service, and the enormous loss of life and property impose an obligation which alone can be discharged by the General Government.

President Wilson said:

In the case of the Mississippi River, it is plain that the Federal Government must build and maintain the levees.

Ex-President Taft said—I quote from him for what it is worth:

I am strongly in favor of expending the whole $50,000,000 to save that part of the country from floods in a reasonable time and to provide a proper levee system.

Ex-President Roosevelt said:

The Nation must build the levees and build them better and more scientifically than ever before.

I could quote other great authorities by the hour to the same effect; but here we are with the war closed; with Europe pressing in every direction for trade and commerce and business; with the United States willing, it seems, to forego the interest on its money, and in some instances it has been suggested to forgive the principal of the bonds; and while we are doing that we are starving our internal improvements to death; while we are doing that, European countries are keeping their money and using it for the purpose of internal improvements and external expansion.

I am informed that when we requested $5,000,000,000 that was due us from the Argentine Republic that Government went to Great Britain and Great Britain promptly loaned her the money, at the same time being in default to us for her debt to us, with the result that a movement is on in Argentine to transfer her trade and commerce to Great Britain. What has that to do with this case? Just this much: It illustrates the fact that the other countries of the world are awake to improvement; they are awake to every question of commerce, while we sit here like sluggards sleeping in the sun, and all about us other nations are surging forward. They are not neglecting their streams; they are not neglecting their rivers; they are not neglecting their opportunities; we sit here and count dollars for improvements that will bring back the money and will develop our country and make it great, splendid, and prosperous. We are not even collecting the interest that is due us, with a very small portion of which we could make every improvement we desire.

Mr. President, ours is the shortest-sighted policy ever pursued by a great nation. What we need in this Nation, and what we will ultimately have, is some man great enough to turn his back to the ocean and his eyes to the country; to cease troubling himself about the intellectual, physical, and moral degenerates of other lands and begin to vision an empire of America for Americans; an empire in which every acre of land shall be employed; where the swamp will give way to the home and the croak of the frog will be drowned in the hum of industry; where every river will bear upon its bosom the commerce of mighty States and of princely cities; where we shall have created a system of transportation so that if our country is ever attacked we can mass our men and mass our materials in a day's time where now it takes weeks of time.

What other country has pursued such a policy as ours? Shall we turn to Germany? The German armies could not have moved and been provisioned in the late war save for the canals and rivers of Germany. In addition to that, the Germans had built their railroads for strategic purposes. We talk about providing for a great Army, but I say that if war were to occur 10 years from now I would rather have a great system of perfected transportation in this country than a hundred thousand, aye, 200,000 men or 500,000 men; for with water and rail transportation perfected we could mobilize our resources and we could be prepared to place along the borders of this country the mightiest army ever assembled, and do it in the shortest conceivable time, and feed them and keep the commerce and the business of the country moving while the war is carried on.

Only $5,000,000 stand between keeping these improvements moving and killing them, but yet before this Congress adjourns we shall vote away fifty millions or one hundred million dollars to some wildcat and chimerical enterprise that promises us nothing. The price of one battleship will equal the entire amount of money appropriated in this bill for all the rivers and harbors of our land, and yet in the event of war a single rock left in one of the harbors of our country might lose us a naval battle and send to their deaths thousands of gallant men.

It is as insane a policy as it would be for a farmer in the interest of economy to refuse to buy the necessary plows to turn over the sod of his fields and to allow them to remain waste lands; it is as foolish a policy as it would be to leave a hole in the roof of a building which was filled with valuable goods and say that you are economizing by not sending for a tinner; it is as foolish a policy as it would be to take a herd of young cattle and starve them through the winter instead of feeding them, and say that you have saved so much on hay when you have lost ten times as much on beef.

Mr. President, I have wearied the Senate talking of this matter and have said all I can say. I call for the yeas and nays on the question.

Mr. LENROOT rose.

Mr. REED. Of course, if any other Senator wishes to speak, I do not desire to shut him off.

Mr. LENROOT. I have no objection to the yeas and nays being ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator from Missouri has made a very adroit appeal to the Senators from Minnesota and to those of us who represent States upon the Mississippi River. The State of Wisconsin borders the Mississippi River for more than 200 miles; but the mere fact that some money is proposed to be expended in his vicinity ought not to appeal to a Senator upon that ground alone.

Now, what is the situation with reference to the Mississippi River? I sincerely hope that the Mississippi River can be improved so that it will float a very great commerce, but the Senator from Missouri knows as well as I do that that is an experiment, an experiment which we hope will be successful; but we have no assurance of its success.

We now have a substantially completed project between St. Louis and New Orleans, and yet there is practically no commerce floating upon it to-day commensurate with the cost of the improvement.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator is wrong about that. We do not have a completed project; that is the entire trouble. The lower Mississippi has sand bars across it——

Mr. LENROOT. What portion of it is not completed, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. REED. The portion below Cairo. As I was saying, there are sand bars across it that have made it impossible for any boat of any size to proceed up and down that river with safety. Everybody knows that the project is not completed, but we are trying to get it completed.

Mr. LENROOT. The project itself, as I recollect, is completed, and, if the enormous sums that we are expending annually for maintenance on the Mississippi River are not sufficient to prevent bars forming and to enable boats to pass up and down the river, we have a most hopeless outlook, indeed, for the future of that river.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield further to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. LENROOT. I yield.

Mr. REED. The Senator ought not to say that. Here is a project two-thirds completed. The Senator knows that a boat can not run over a sand bar and that if you have a project two-thirds completed and then sand bars form in the middle of it you might as well have none of it completed.

Mr. LENROOT. I wish to ask the Senator what portion of the project from St. Louis to Cairo is not completed? There is a uniform depth of 8 feet for the entire distance, as I understand.

Mr. REED. Oh, no; the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. LENROOT. If I am mistaken it is because of the fact which I have stated, that although, as I recollect, we are spending nearly half a million dollars for maintenance, that sum is not sufficient for maintenance. That can be the only answer.

Mr. REED. Oh, the answer is that, of course, you have got to maintain a river. You have got to maintain a railroad, too——

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. You have got to maintain a horse and a wagon; anything you have you have got to maintain. But if you have a river improvement that is not completed at all so that commerce can utilize the river you might as well have no river at all.

Mr. LENROOT. But it is completed, I beg to say to the Senator.

Mr. REED. Well, the Senator is gravely mistaken about it; that is all.

Mr. LENROOT. However that may be, Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if the improvement is not completed to St. Louis it ought to be completed at the very earliest possible moment.

Mr. REED. Yes; that is why I want some money appropriated by this bill.

Mr. LENROOT. The Senator is getting it. Mr. President, if commerce can not be developed from St. Louis to New Orleans upon a completed project, it is idle to talk about any considerable commerce being developed from St. Paul and Minneapolis to New Orleans, because there is the great Southwest Territory that is naturally tributary to St. Louis that would furnish the commerce if, as an economic proposition, it could be advantageously carried by water.

I believe that the commerce can be developed upon the Mississippi River, but not any such commerce as the Senator from Missouri evidently has in mind. These are not like the old days, Mr. President, when the Mississippi River was the only means of communication for a great section of country.

The Senator says that the railroads, through low rates, have destroyed commerce upon the Mississippi River. I think that is true in part, but only in part. The fact is that commerce can not be developed upon any stream where the haul by water is only a portion, and a short portion, of the total haul; in other words, commerce can not be developed where it is necessary, in the first instance, to transport by rail to a river point, then ship by water a short distance to another point down the river, and then transfer to rail for shipment to the interior. It can not be done. It is not a matter of unreasonable rates at all; but it is not an economical proposition because of the terminal charges and the cost of loading and reloading. However, I do believe it is possible to establish a through commerce upon the Mississippi River to New Orleans and from New Orleans to foreign ports. I want to see that experiment tried; but, as I said a moment ago, unless such a commerce can be successfully developed from St. Louis to New Orleans it can not be expected that it will be developed further up the river.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I ask purely for information. Many years ago, as we read, there was a considerable commerce carried upon the waters of the Mississippi River. Those who have had the pleasure of reading Mark Twain remember the boats which he describes that plied between various parts of the States and the mouth of the Mississippi River. What is the reason that there is so little commerce now? What is the reason that upon the waters of the Missouri River there is so little commerce now, measured by what was carried many, many years ago?

Mr. LENROOT. I am very glad to give the Senator my judgment as to the reason. I think, as the Senator from Missouri has said, that in part it is due to the unreasonably low rates made by railroads to destroy water competition, but that is only a part of it. As to the greater part of the commerce which no longer exists upon the river, it goes by rail because it is cheaper to transport it by rail at fair rates than it is by water, for the reason that I stated a moment ago. Commerce does not originate to any great extent upon a river point. It must come from the interior. It must come by rail to be unloaded at the initial point, then loaded on to boats, shipped a few hundred miles by water, unloaded there, reloaded on cars, and then shipped into the interior. Now, so far as that character of commerce is concerned, it would be cheaper to carry it at a very high rate by rail than to transport it by water, and we never can hope to restore upon the Mississippi River that character of commerce.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the Senator whether or not upon the Mississippi and Missouri Rivers, as well as upon many other streams upon which we are now spending millions of dollars, there are not adequate railroad facilities for the purpose of meeting all of the demands of commerce?

Mr. LENROOT. No; I would not say that. I doubt that very much.

Mr. KING. Is there any complaint now about there being an inadequate system of transportation to carry to the Gulf the commerce that could find an outlet there?

Mr. LENROOT. I think the shortage of cars upon the railroads is general, and affects all parts of our country. That is my judgment about it.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator contend that we ought to encourage the development of our rivers and harbors merely for the purpose of cheapening railroad transportation?

Mr. LENROOT. Not at all. I never have been in favor of that theory. We have control over rates, and if the railroads have been imposing a higher rate than is reasonable, it is not necessary to spend hundreds of millions of dollars to bring down rates, when we have an Interstate Commerce Commission here in Washington whose duty it is to see that only a reasonable rate is imposed.

Mr. KING. Then the Senator, as I understand, agrees with the soundness of the policy which was recommended by the Waterways Commission in their final report, wherein they discuss that feature, and state that—

> The United States must also adopt a definite policy regarding the relations between railways and waterways before any marked improvement in river transportation can be looked for. Such a policy must be based upon the idea that the purpose of improving waterways is to secure additional means of transportation and not to reduce or regulate railway rates. Experience has demonstrated that waterways can not be relied upon as the great cheapeners and regulators of railway rates which they once were supposed to be.

Mr. LENROOT. I am entirely in harmony with that view, but I do believe that there are possibilities of establishing on the Mississippi River through commerce, from South to North, and North to South, and thence to foreign ports. Whether it can be done or not, we do not know; but I want to see the experiment fully carried out. If it shall be successful from St. Louis to New Orleans, we can expect it to be successful from St. Paul and Minneapolis to New Orleans. If it shall be successful from St. Louis to New Orleans, we can expect that the improvement of the Missouri River from Kansas City to the mouth would be equally successful; but I do think that so long as it is an experiment, it is the height of folly to be conducting several experiments at one time, when one experiment will demonstrate the success or the failure of the project.

Now, Mr. President, with reference to the appropriations in this bill, the pending amendment is for $24,000,000; and the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], and other Senators who have spoken upon the bill go upon the theory that if we should spend more than is provided for by the committee we would have an immediate resulting benefit to commerce. That is not the fact at all, under the report of the engineers themselves. If we spend the four million additional dollars that this amendment provides for, it will not carry an additional pound of commerce upon any of the projects upon which it will be spent; and remember that wherever we spend money upon a project that will not result in an immediate improvement to commerce, we are thereby increasing the cost of living to the people of this country instead of reducing it.

Mr. REED rose.

Mr. LENROOT. I will not yield for just a moment. I want to develop this.

Mr. President, why is that? Take this New York project; take the Delaware River project; take the Ohio River project—and that is where most of this additional four millions would be spent, under the estimates of the Board of Engineers. If you spend that four millions there, you will not add a ton of commerce by reason of the expenditure of those four millions, but you will have done this: Every man employed upon a project where there is no immediate benefit to commerce is taking just that much out of production of the necessaries which the country so sadly needs to-day. Every bag of cement that is used upon a project that will not result in immediate benefit to commerce will increase the cost of buildling operations everywhere in this country. So that where our trouble to-day is in the shortage of production, by increasing these appropriations for purposes that will not result in immediate benefit to commerce we will bring about just that much greater shortage of production next year.

Now I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what does the Senator mean by saying that these improvements will not be of immediate benefit to commerce?

Mr. LENROOT. Exactly what I said. I will proceed to demonstrate it, if the Senator would like to have me.

Mr. REED. I should be very glad if the Senator would demonstrate it.

Mr. LENROOT. Very well.

Mr. REED. If any of them has to be absolutely completed before we can get commerce through, then, unless the work is begun, the benefit never will come.

Mr. LENROOT. I said "resulting in immediate benefit to commerce."

Mr. REED. Oh, well, of course, throwing the rocks out of Hell Gate will not result in an immediate benefit, but there will be an immediate benefit as soon as the rocks are out.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; when the project is completed, I agree.

Mr. REED. Exactly; and if it is necessary to do it, we ought to start to get them out; ought we not?

Mr. LENROOT. Not under these conditions; no. That is just the point I am making. Where there is no immediate benefit to commerce, in view of the necessity of men and in view of the necessity of supplies, where we need to have every ounce of our power directed to increase production, we ought not to take men and materials out of productive lines and put them into nonproductive lines.

Mr. REED. Does the Senator know of a single one of these projects that will not relieve commerce to some extent if there is money employed on it this year, although it is not completed this year?

Mr. LENROOT. Yes.

Mr. REED. I should like to have the Senator name them.

Mr. LENROOT. All right; I will start in with the East River. The testimony shows there will be no immediate resulting benefit to commerce, yet for that an estimate is made of $2,100,000, where they had on November 1, unexpended, $4,784,000.

Mr. REED. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. LENROOT. The East River, from the report of the committee on page 2, where the average expenditure for the last five years was $234,000, and the expenditure last year was $566,000.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator read the clause which states that there will be no benefit to commerce?

Mr. LENROOT. That was in the testimony. It was not in the report.

Mr. REED. Who testified to that?

Mr. LENROOT. Well, it is there; and that is bound to be true, because this will not complete the project.

Now, we will go on to the next one, the Delaware River, where an estimate is made of $2,000,000. That is not going to be of any immediate benefit to commerce, because this improvement is for a 35-foot channel, and this will not complete it, and it is of no benefit to commerce to have a 35-foot channel half the way and a 30-foot channel the other half of the way. No greater draft of boats can move up the Delaware River after the expenditure of this $2,000,000 than moved up before the expenditure.

Mr. REED. Did the Senator vote for any money to go to the Delaware River?

Mr. LENROOT. Oh, yes.

Mr. REED. Why did he vote for it when it was not going to be of immediate benefit?

Mr. LENROOT. Because Col. Taylor stated that they had a plant there, and that great loss would result to the Government from the idleness of the plant unless they could move along at a certain rate.

Mr. REED. Exactly.

Mr. LENROOT. And I did it for the purpose of going on with that improvement, so that there would not be a loss to the Government, but not because there would be any immediate resulting benefit to commerce.

Then we come, next, to the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal, where the estimate is for a million dollars. Does the Senator from Missouri say that there will be any immediate benefit to commerce with the expenditure of that million dollars? I greatly question whether there will ever be any benefit to commerce commensurate with the cost of that commerce.

And so I could go on here, and it will more than cover the $4,000,000 for which the Senator from Missouri so eloquently pleads. There will be no immediate resulting benefit to commerce, but it will result in taking men out of production, where they are sorely needed, and taking building material where it is so sorely needed. What kind of business sense is it for Senators to think of making appropriations under those conditions, with this shortage in the Treasury, and with the shortage of production that exists to-day?

Mr. President, taking these items, they say that we are niggardly; that we should make larger appropriations. I observe on the other side of the aisle, in the roll calls that have been made, that it is very clear that the Democratic side of the Senate feel that they have no responsibility now for the expenditures of this Government.

Of course when they get upon the stump they will talk about the appropriations made by this Republican Congress and criticize us, when, as I recollect it, every Senator upon the other side of the aisle, with two or three exceptions, has voted for the $27,000,000 amendment increasing the appropriation in this bill.

Take the East River. The estimate is $2,100,000, and they had on hand November 1, $4,786,000, and expended last year the sum of only $506,000. Without this $2,000,000 at all it will permit an expenditure of eight times the amount which was expended upon that river last year.

On the Delaware River they expended last year $822,000, and they had on hand November 1, $1,136,000, and with the additional million it is proposed to give them instead of the two million they would have more than $2,000,000 to spend this year upon the Delaware River, a greater sum than has ever been expended upon the Delaware River in any single year.

I have spoken already of the Chesapeake & Delaware Canal. Does the Senator from Missouri defend that expenditure with the condition of the Treasury as it is to-day? If he does, I would begin to think that, contrary to the Senator's usual policy, he has forgotten the condition of the Treasury or the interests of the taxpayer.

Galveston Channel is to receive $600,000, according to the revised estimate. There was on hand November 1 the sum of $599,000, and last year there was expended only $190,000, and the average for five years was only $141,000.

For the Ohio River there was a balance unexpended on January 1, 1920, of $9,478,000, including contracts which had been made, and included in that sum of unallotted funds on November 1 there was unexpended $4,597,000. Is not that liberal to the Ohio River? When, in the history of the Congress, have we been more liberal or have there been greater expenditures upon the Ohio River than will be made under this bill, not with the $27,000,000, not with the $24,000,000, but with the $20,000,000 provided for by the committee?

No, Mr. President, they can not make out a case that we are not taking care of the rivers and harbors of this country as fully as the present condition of the Treasury warrants.

But more than that, Mr. President, I want to say to the proponents of these amendments, where they seek to secure greater sums than recommended by the committee, they are defeating their own ends in doing it, and I think I know whereof I speak. It may be that if we can hold this down to $20,000,000 a compromise may be made in conference on a sum somewhere between fifteen and eighteen million dollars, but if you had adopted the amendment making the appropriation $27,000,000, or if you shall adopt this amendment making it $24,000,000, it is my judgment that the conferees on the part of the House would give no consideration whatever to the judgment of the Senate in raising these sums, but if we hold it to the committee recommendation a fair case can be made.

In my judgment this bill when finally agreed upon by the conference committee, especially if this amendment is adopted, will not carry to exceed $15,000,000. When you are trying to get a larger sum than that you are running the danger not of $15,000,000 but of no bill at all.

So, in the interest of liberal expenditures properly made, in the interest of getting as much as possible in the river and harbor bill at this session, every friend of rivers and harbors ought to vote to hold this appropriation down to the amount recommended by the committee, namely, $20,000,000.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, here is a strange argument, that we should make no improvement unless immediately a benefit will result to commerce; that is to say, unless there is enough money appropriated now so that a project can be absolutely completed we should appropriate no money now to carry on the work.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, the Senator does not mean to inaccurately quote me. I made no such statement. There are many projects which can result in immediate benefit to commerce without full completion of the project.

Mr. REED. I will state it the Senator's way, that no money ought to be appropriated to a project unless an immediate benefit to commerce would come; that is to say, if it is going to take this appropriation, plus one to be made next year, to complete a project, we should not begin it this year. That is to say, you should not lay the foundation for a house because the next morning you can not move in your kitchen furniture. Consequently, you would never have any house. Yet the Senator has sat here and voted for a bill the numerous items of which he himself says embraced projects which can not be completed this year, and which will not, therefore, result in any benefit to commerce this year.

The Senator cited two instances. Against the Senator's expert opinion as to the Delaware River I put the opinion of the Army engineers. His argument is that there should be nothing spent on that river because we can not get a benefit this year. We are so nearsighted we can not see three months ahead, or six months ahead, or a year ahead. The engineers said as to the Delaware River:

The appropriation recommended in Col. Taylor's memorandum is $2,000,000. The reduction proposed is $1,000,000.

I will not read, but I will put in the RECORD the rest of the comment of the Chief of Engineers, which is found in paragraphs 3 and 4 of his letter, and is an absolute condemnation of all the Senator has said:

3. The project for the improvement of the Delaware River from Philadelphia to the sea provides for a channel 35 feet in depth at mean low water. The present controlling depth is 30 feet. The commerce of this port is approximately 25,000,000 tons per year, valued at over $2,000,000,000. An important navy yard is located near the head of the channel. The earliest possible completion of this project is regarded as of utmost importance to the great commerce. With a view to pressing the completion, a large amount of plant, including the dredge Corozal acquired from the Panama Canal, has recently been secured. To utilize this plant it will be necessary to purchase certain additional accessories, including a rehandling dredge for disposing of the material dredged by the Corozal. The cost of maintaining the plant in idleness would be a large sum.

4. The condition of the appropriations is now such that the department is seriously considering the rejection of a most advantageous bid for the execution of a large amount of necessary new work in Philadelphia Harbor. With the amount of $1,000,000 only, in addition to the amount which could be allotted from a lump-sum appropriation of $5,000,000 for the maintenance of all the harbors in the United States, it would be necessary to seriously curtail operations during the coming summer. The United States would suffer a considerable financial loss in the expenditures necessary for the care of idle plant, and the development of the commerce of the port would suffer great injury. The reduction proposed is considered most undesirable.

The Senator referred to the Ohio River project and told us how much money is on hand. He knows that nearly all of that money is contracted for or expended, and he knows that Col. Taylor reported in paragraphs 11 and 12 of his letter:

The project for the improvement of the Ohio River * * * is the largest comprehensive project of river and harbor improvement in this country.

Without reading, I ask leave to print the balance of the engineer's comment on that. He condemned the idea of cutting down that appropriation to the point named.

12. The project for the improvement of the Ohio River, to afford a navigable depth of 9 feet, is the largest comprehensive project of river and harbor improvement in this country. The work is now being actively prosecuted at 15 locks and dams, in part by contract and in part by United States plant and hired labor. The present appropriations have been reduced to such a low ebb that the reallotment of funds between the various works has been necessary to permit essential work to continue. The cessation of appropriations would disorganize the work and would be most disadvantageous to the United States. It is intended to apply a considerable portion of the sum recommended to the completion of the Emsworth Dam, which will replace the first two dams below Pittsburgh. The present structures, built many years ago, are in extremely bad repair and may break at any moment. The sum recommended is regarded as the minimum necessary for the economical prosecution of this project.

13. Commerce is endeavoring to utilize the Ohio River as rapidly as the work of the Government in building locks and dams will permit, and it is believed that this most important project, on which so many business interests of the central part of the country depend, should be pushed at as rapid a rate of progress as is possible. The million dollars requested in this bill is sufficient to keep the work of construction progressing at a proper rate, but if omitted would cause a cessation of work which would be not only most expensive to the United States on account of disorganization of forces and care of plant, but would also greatly interfere with important and large business interests which are making all preparations to utilize the improvement as it progresses. It is believed that this item should be retained, whatever else may be omitted.

Mr. President, there is just one remark of the Senator, aside from that, to which I want to reply. He tells us that river transportation can not succeed where there have to be shipments into the country. I have already explained that the railroads, under their old system, refused to interchange freight or to make joint rates. Joint rates are now being established and have been established at many points. Joint rates will be established at many other points if the Interstate Commerce Commission does its duty. Let me give just one illustration from the facts to show how badly the Senator is mistaken. Last fall, with an inefficient equipment, one boat carried 79,600 bags of sugar from New Orleans to St. Louis. Only 16,000 of those bags were used in St. Louis. The rest of them were shipped to interior points, far from the river, and that was done at a splendid saving in the matter of freight. That is just one example which shows how our theories can be erroneous.

That is all I desire to say, Mr. President, and I will ask for the yeas and nays on this question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment to the amendment.

PROPOSED WAR DEBT POOL.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to take a few minutes to call attention to another matter which I think it will be well for the Senate to bear in mind and which I shall ask to have printed in the RECORD.

During the meetings of the peace conference in Paris I heard from one of the delegates there that there was great pressure to get an arrangement or an agreement in the treaty or the league by which all the loans of the different countries could be merged and then all the countries engaged in war were to become jointly liable; it was to be a joint bond. Of course, that meant making the United States and Great Britain alone the guarantors, for most of the other guarantors would not have been of very great value for the debts of the world.

Now, that has been renewed. I read a dispatch yesterday, under the heading "League fight over finances coming in May." I do not want to take the time of the Senate in reading it all, but I should like to have it all printed:

Trouble is already foreseen in the renewed agitation by countries like France in favor of the old scheme for pooling war debts or for endowing the financial section of the league with power to negotiate an international bond issue of some kind. This suggestion, which was made repeatedly during the peace conference, always encountered disapproval by Americans, notable among whom were Thomas W. Lamont, Bernard M. Baruch, and Henry P. Davison, who regarded it as uneconomic and without a chance of obtaining American cooperation.

I did not know whether those gentlemen were opposing it at the time, but our delegation there certainly opposed it, and were a good deal disturbed about it at the time.

Now, some French publicists—

I am reading again—

Now, some French publicists are urging France to adopt this plan for her offensive at the Brussels meeting as against the idea advanced by J. M. Keynes, the British financial expert, author of The Economic Consequences of the Peace. The French fear the latter plan—

Which, I think, put the whole expense of rehabilitating Germany upon us, and the consequence is that—

The French fear the latter plan will have the support of the league body delegates.

Mr. President, that is coming up again, and either by giving power to the league by necessary amendment or as a separate proposition we shall be brought face to face with it. Of course, not being in the league, we shall not be rendered liable unless we voluntarily join in a treaty to pool all the debts. It is to my mind a very great danger, not that I think we are going to accede to it, but that if we should be drawn into such a treaty it would become a very serious danger to the whole American people, and would mean a burden of taxation which it would be difficult to estimate.

I call attention to it, and ask to have the whole article printed, of which I have read only a few paragraphs, because I think it is worth considering.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Will the Senator state what the article is? I did not understand.

Mr. LODGE. It is a press dispatch from Paris.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Whose proposal does it purport to contain?

Mr. LODGE. It is a matter to be brought before the meeting of the league.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Who says so?

Mr. LODGE. The French say so. The Senator is always desirous to have authority. It states that M. Poincare, former President of the French Republic, chairman of the reparation commission, in an article in the Revue des Deux Mondes, said:

It can scarcely be concealed that if at the Brussels session, at which there will be present not only Government representatives but a large number of bankers and financiers, a program is not clearly defined and the discussion strictly limited in advance, we will wake up some fine day before the ruins of the peace treaty.

He thinks it is serious.

An article by Jacques Bardoux, in L'Opinion, insists that the French cabinet must be prepared for a fight in Brussels.

"Neutrals and allies will come to Brussels with a program which is already known," he says. "Keynes has drawn it up, Lord Robert Cecil and Mr. Asquith have adopted it, and now Premier Nitti has made it his own. This program aims at restoring German production at the expense of Franco-Belgian credit.

"OFFENSIVE ADVISED FOR FRANCE.

"Our defensive will be efficacious only in the measure wherein it becomes a concerted offensive which will have for its object the creation of an international organization to coordinate the liquidation of our war debt."

I think M. Poincare and these other writers of importance know what is coming. France desires a general pooling of the war debts. Mr. Keynes's plan or remedy was, as I understood it in his last chapter, that we should furnish all the money necessary to rehabilitate Germany, because his whole argument, as the Senator probably knows, is the necessity of rehabilitating Germany. His plan or remedy is very simple. It was that we should bear the expense. That is the difference between the two plans. That those plans are coming up there can not be any doubt.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood the Senator to say something about a meeting of the League of Nations——

Mr. LODGE. That is precisely when it is coming up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. As though the League of Nations, which is composed of 30 or 40 nations that had no part in the war, would have anything to say concerning the distribution or funding of the debt.

Mr. LODGE. M. Bardoux says:

Neutrals and allies will come to Brussels with a program which is already known. Keynes has drawn it up.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator, of course, does not credit any report that the League of Nations would have anything whatever to do with the distribution of the debts incurred as a result of the war?

Mr. LODGE. I do not know whether they have that power under the present draft or not. I think it is doubtful. My own belief is that what they intend is to amend the league. The French plan is evidently the one that was proposed and urged during the peace negotiations, which was that all the nations engaged in the war should pool their debts. That is coming up at the league meeting. It has been stated over and over again.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. A great many preposterous statements have been made.

Mr. LODGE. It is of no consequence to us what the league does?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator from Massachusetts would not credit for a moment any statement that 20 or 25 or 30 or 35 nations in the League of Nations would have anything to do concerning the distribution of the debts of the five or six nations who fought the war?

Mr. LODGE. Five or six nations? There were 32 signatories to the treaty.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Certainly; but they were not engaged in the war; they did not incur debts in the war; and any such proposition as to pooling the debts of the war, preposterous as it is, could only be participated in by the nations interested.

Mr. LODGE. Even the greatest of foreign countries I do not think ever conceived the idea that the people who had no debts were going to pool them.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. So if the article indicates that the League of Nations is to take up this inquiry it is preposterous.

Mr. LODGE. It is not preposterous at all. The opinions of these Frenchmen and Englishmen are not preposterous. Mr. Keynes's is not preposterous.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I understood this is a newspaper article from some unknown author.

Mr. LODGE. It is a press dispatch.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But I do not quite understand the Senator's purpose in putting it in the RECORD.

Mr. LODGE. My purpose in putting it in the RECORD is that an effort is going to be made by them, and it is admitted by both French and English authorities that there is going to be an effort to so amend the league, if it needs amendment, as to form a combination for taking care of the war debts by a pool. That is what they are asking.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Does the Senator think that the countries which had nothing to do with fighting the war would voluntarily assume a share of the indebtedness?

Mr. LODGE. I am not saying that they would assume it. The people who assume the debt would be the people who owe the debt, of course, and the object is to make it joint. But the neutrals will have no objection to having us pay the debts.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator credits the suggestion, then, that the 20 or 30 nations, outside of those who fought the war, intend to make a proposition that those who fought the war shall pool the debts——

Mr. LODGE. Who are the 20 or 30 nations outside the treaty?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not outside the treaty. I did not say that, but outside of the nations that fought the war. There were only six or seven nations that fought the war, and the League of Nations is composed already of something like 27, as I recall the number.

Mr. LODGE. Of course, the League of Nations was composed, to begin with, of the allied and associated powers, and they numbered 32, including Great Britain's dominions.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. But those in the league now are those that have ratified the treaty.

Mr. LODGE. They are; and there are some neutrals there, too.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. They number something like 27, as I recall it.

Mr. LODGE. There were 27, and if you include the five British dominions with subordinate votes, there were 32, as I recall it. I think now there are about 40.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I want to ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he thinks it is worthy of any credence that those nations now composing the League of Nations are going to amend the constitution of the League of Nations so as to take over the jurisdiction and control of the debts of all the nations of the world?

Mr. LODGE. I think it is a most obvious thing in the world for them to do. Of course, those people who have no debt will not be in it, but those people who are in it will be very certain to vote that the people who do owe the debt should pay through the league. What is it to Holland or Spain whether we pay the debt or somebody else pays it? They do what European interests demand.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Yet the Senator gives credence to the suggestion that the 20 or 30 nations that have not any interest in the debt, that did not fight the war, will presume to distribute the debt among the nations that did fight the war.

Mr. LODGE. They will furnish the votes to amend the constitution of the league, and that is all they have to do. Of course, the people who do not owe money will not be included in the agreement to pay money, but when Monsieur Poincare, who has been recently President of the French Republic, discusses in an elaborate article what will be done at this meeting of the league, I venture to say that he knows as much about it as the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I am very much surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts, however much he criticizes the league, should seriously assert that the League of Nations' constitution could be so amended that the league could take over jurisdiction or control of the indebtedness of the nations of the world. It is such a preposterous suggestion that I am very much surprised that the Senator from Massachusetts indulges in it.

Mr. LODGE. Calling it preposterous is no argument at all. The facts are as I have stated them. The facts are given by men of undoubted authority, Mr. Asquith and the premier of Italy. They know what they are doing, and the point is, either through the league or outside by a separate agreement, to pool the debts of the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There is no one in Great Britain who favors doing so.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. Keynes simply wants us to rehabilitate Germany, not to pay the debts of the world.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. The Senator knows that when the suggestion was made in Paris it was simply laughed out of the council; it was too preposterous to be considered. There is no more possibility of the United States assuming the indebtedness of other countries than of the Senator from Massachusetts assuming my indebtedness.

Mr. LODGE. It was seriously considered there.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Not by any nations that had any of the debts to assume.

Mr. LODGE. It was seriously considered there, and opposed by the United States alone.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. It was not seriously considered, I assert. It was not a debatable question.

Mr. LODGE. I know it was seriously considered. I know they were alarmed by it. I had information from members of the conference.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Nebraska how he knows it was not seriously considered behind the locked doors over there and how he gets his inside information?

Mr. LODGE. I have no doubt the information of the Senator from Nebraska is excellent. I have been discussing simply what all the world knows is an attempt that is being made. That is commonplace; everybody knows it. They want to pool the debts. They failed to do it in the treaty. They are now going to make another effort. There are two views as to how it shall be done. One is that we should undertake to finance Germany. The other is the French idea, which was brought up before, the pooling of the debts, and that attempt will be made. I never heard of anyone before who doubted it. But if they are going to try to use the league for that purpose I think it adds to its charms.

There being no objection, the press dispatch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

LEAGUE FIGHT OVER FINANCES COMING IN MAY—WAR-DEBT POOL COMES UP—PARIS FEARS GERMANY WILL BE REHABILITATED AT EXPENSE OF FRENCH PEOPLE.

[Special cable dispatch to the Sun and New York Herald. Copyright, 1920, by the Sun and New York Herald.]

"PARIS, April 24.

"The interallied financial conference which has been called by the League of Nations to meet in Brussels at the end of May is expected to do more toward solving the world economic problem than did the peace conference. This is because the assembly will include all neutrals as well as former belligerents and, in addition to official representatives of the various Governments, individual bankers and merchants of the greatest financial renown are expected to attend it.

"However, trouble is already foreseen in the renewed agitation by countries like France in favor of the old scheme for pooling war debts or for endowing the financial section of the league with power to negotiate an international bond issue of some kind. This suggestion, which was made repeatedly during the peace conference, always encountered disapproval by Americans, notable among whom were Thomas W. Lamont, Bernard M. Baruch, and Henry P. Davison, who regarded it as uneconomic and without a chance of obtaining American cooperation.

"Now some French publicists are urging France to adopt this plan for her offensive at the Brussels meeting, as against the idea advanced by J. M. Keynes, the British financial expert, author of The Economic Consequences of the Peace. The French fear the latter plan will have the support of the league body delegates.

"CULMINATION IN BRUSSELS.

"There is some reason to believe that the whole movement for treaty revision, in so far as economic terms will go, likely will culminate in Brussels and that the premiers are awaiting the results.

"Since France probably will be represented at the conference by Raymond Poincare, chairman of the reparation commission, there is considerable significance in an article by him in the Revue des Deux Mondes recently, in which he warns:

"'It can scarcely be concealed that if at the Brussels session, at which there will be present not only Government representatives but a large number of bankers and financiers, a program is not clearly defined and the discussion strictly limited in advance, we will wake up some fine day before the ruins of the peace treaty.'

"An article by Jacques Bardoux, in L'Opinion, insists that the French cabinet must be prepared for a fight in Brussels.

"'Neutrals and allies will come to Brussels with a program which is already known,' he says. 'Keynes has drawn it up, Lord Robert Cecil and Mr. Asquith have adopted it, and now Premier Nitti has made it his own. This program aims at restoring German production at the expenses of Franco-Belgian credit.

"'OFFENSIVE ADVISED FOR FRANCE.

"'Our defensive will be efficacious only in the measure wherein it becomes a concerted offensive which will have for its object the creation of an international organization to coordinate the liquidation of our war debt.

"'Whether the financial section of the league gives more value to Germany's obligations; whether it liquidates the interallied loans, or assumes charge of any part of the war debt and damages, it can, at all events, in issuing its own bonds and in realizing an equal distribution of exchanges, permit France to improve the situation in her treasury while awaiting Germany's payments.'"

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] proposing to increase the amount reported by the committee from $20,000,000 to $24,000,000.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the reasons given by Senators who favor the increase of the amount are very largely the reasons that influenced the committee in increasing the amount to be appropriated by the bill over that provided by the House. The reasons stated by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] as to why we determined upon the amount of $20,000,000 make it unnecessary for me to discuss the matter further.

Mr. LENROOT. Just one word, Mr. President.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] asked to have inserted in the RECORD the report of Col. Taylor, of the Engineers. The Senator said that report refuted every word I have said concerning the Delaware and Ohio Rivers. The Senator from Missouri did not read all of Col. Taylor's report. I merely wish to state to the Senator that I have read that report since he has had it inserted in the RECORD and that there is not one word in the report which even hints that the expenditure of this money will be of any immediate benefit to commerce, either in the case of the Delaware River or the Ohio River.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON] to the amendment of the committee. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. GLASS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. SHERMAN]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. STANLEY] and vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE (when his name was called). Making the same transfer of my pair as before, I vote "nay."

Mr. STERLING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH]. I understand, however, that if that Senator were present he would vote as I shall vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BECKHAM]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] and vote "nay."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I am paired with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I transfer my pair to the senior Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and vote "nay."

Mr. TRAMMELL (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. COLT]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] and vote "yea."

Mr. UNDERWOOD (when his name was called). I transfer my general pair with the junior Senator from Ohio [Mr. HARDING] to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McLEAN. I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS]. In his absence, I withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] is unavoidably absent from the Senate. He is paired. If present he would vote "yea."

Mr. KING. Upon this vote I am paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. KENDRICK. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. GERRY] and vote "yea."

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD). The Chair transfers his pair with the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and votes "nay."

Mr. SMITH of Maryland (after having voted in the affirmative). I notice that my pair, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. DILLINGHAM], has not voted. Therefore I shall have to withdraw my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the affirmative). I understand that the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. KNOX], with whom I have a pair, voted for the amendment of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED], proposing a larger increase in the appropriation than that now proposed. I assume, therefore, that if present, he would now vote for the lesser appropriation, and I shall take the liberty of permitting my vote to stand.

Mr. OWEN (after having voted in the affirmative). I ask if the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. EDGE] has voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. He has not.

Mr. OWEN. I withdraw my vote, having a pair with that Senator.

Mr. CURTIS. I have been requested to announce the following pairs:

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. BALL] with the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER];

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. ELKINS] with the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE];

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN] with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH];

The Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. KIRBY];

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS]; and

The Senator from Indiana [Mr. WATSON] with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. WOLCOTT].

The result was announced—yeas 32, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—32.

Ashurst	Harris	Nugent	Simmons
Chamberlain	Harrison	Overman	Smith, Ariz.
Comer	Henderson	Phelan	Spencer
Culberson	Hitchcock	Pittman	Sterling
Dial	Jones, N. Mex.	Ransdell	Swanson
France	Kendrick	Reed	Thomas
Gay	McKellar	Sheppard	Trammell
Glass	McNary	Shields	Underwood

NAYS—22.

Calder	Jones, Wash.	Moses	Sutherland
Capper	Kellogg	Nelson	Townsend
Curtis	Keyes	New	Wadsworth
Fernald	Lenroot	Page	Warren
Gronna	Lodge	Phipps
Hale	McCumber	Smoot

NOT VOTING—42.

Ball	Frelinghuysen	McCormick	Smith, Ga.
Beckham	Gerry	McLean	Smith, Md.
Borah	Gore	Myers	Smith, S. C.
Brandegee	Harding	Newberry	Stanley
Colt	Johnson, Calif.	Norris	Walsh, Mass.
Cummins	Johnson, S. Dak.	Owen	Walsh, Mont.
Dillingham	Kenyon	Penrose	Watson
Edge	King	Poindexter	Williams
Elkins	Kirby	Pomerene	Wolcott
Fall	Knox	Robinson
Fletcher	La Follette	Sherman

So Mr. HARRISON's amendment to the committee amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on agreeing to the committee amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I ask now to have stated the next amendment which was passed over, being the amendment on page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 2, after the word "Provided," it is proposed to strike out:

That $5,000,000 of the sum herein appropriated may be allotted for the preservation and maintenance of existing river and harbor works, and $7,000,000 of the sum herein appropriated may be allotted for the prosecution of works of improvement heretofore authorized by Congress: Provided further.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I merely wish to say that I hope the amendment will be agreed to. It is proposed in the interest of economy. Col. Taylor has assured the committee that without the limitation he could accomplish far more with the amount of money which we propose to appropriate than to have it divided as proposed by the language recommended to be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The next amendment passed over, I think, is on page 18, being section 10.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 18, after line 14, it is proposed to insert:

SEC. 10. That section 4 of the river and harbor appropriation act approved June 25, 1910, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. That whenever any vessel belonging to or employed by the United States engaged upon river and harbor works collides with and damages another vessel, pier, or other legal structure belonging to any person or corporation, and whenever, in the prosecution of river and harbor works an accident occurs damaging or destroying property belonging to any person or corporation, and whenever personal property of employees of the United States, who are employed on or in connection with river and harbor works, is damaged or destroyed in connection with the loss, threatened loss, or damage to United States property, or through efforts to save life or to preserve United States property, the Chief of Engineers shall cause an immediate examination to be made, and if, in his judgment, the facts and circumstances are such as to make the whole or any part of the damages or destruction a proper charge against the United States, the Chief of Engineers, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, shall have authority to adjust and settle all claims for damages or destruction caused by the above designated collisions, accidents, etc., in cases where the damage or expense does not exceed $500, and pay the same from the appropriation directly involved, and to report such as exceed $500 to Congress for its consideration."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A point of order raised by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] is pending to the amendment just stated.

Mr. MCNARY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote by which the Senate committee amendment on page 12, line 16, was adopted. The word "including" was stricken out, and the words "with a view of" inserted. As the provision was prepared by the House committee and as it passed the House the word "including" would permit a survey not only for the purpose of considering the methods to be employed in removing the submerged rock but also in deepening the channel. The Senate committee, however, in changing the wording, have restricted the provision so that it now only contemplates a survey for the purpose of removing the submerged rock. I desire it to remain as provided in the House bill, and therefore ask unanimous consent to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Oregon. I think it ought to be granted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the vote whereby the amendment referred to was agreed to will be reconsidered. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The committee amendment should be rejected.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SWANSON obtained the floor.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I hope the Senator will wait until we dispose of section 10. As I understand, a point of order has been raised against that section.

Mr. SWANSON. Very well, I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I simply desire to say that I do not believe the point of order, which is that it is general legislation upon an appropriation bill, is well taken. Assuming that the river and harbor appropriation bill is to be treated as any other general appropriation measure, I do not think that the amendment proposed is general legislation. It relates only to a particular subject, to a particular class of people, and applies only to a particular class of work.

The section amends section 4 of the river and harbor act of June 25, 1910, under which provision was made for the settlements of claims for damages growing out of collisions, and so on. The amendment leaves that section as it was, but adds to it certain language. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the particular language in line 24:

and whenever personal property of employees of the United States—

That is a restriction; it applies only to employees of the United States; and it does not apply to all such employees, but only to those—who are employed on or in connection with river and harbor works—

Particular ones employed on a particular work—is damaged or destroyed in connection with the loss, threatened loss, or damage to United States property, or through efforts to save life or to preserve United States property—

It is restricted further; it does not apply to a general loss of property by even this class of employees, but is confined to the loss or damage of property in connection with a particular circumstance, and that is when the property—

Is damaged or destroyed in connection with the loss, threatened loss, or damage to United States property, or through efforts to save life or to preserve United States property.

Mr. President, it seems to me that that can not be construed as general legislation, for it is clearly special legislation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KING. Does not the Senator know that the courts, including the Supreme Court of the United States, have held repeatedly that legislation is general even though it is limited to but one class; for instance, legislation dealing with insurance companies alone? In the Kansas insurance case such legislation was denominated general legislation, and was held not subject to the attack which was made upon it that it was special legislation, although it related to insurance companies alone.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, we are not controlled in the construction of our rules by decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States. I give a great deal of weight and a great deal of credence to the rulings of the Supreme Court of the United States, but they have no control with reference to the construction of the rules of the United States Senate in governing itself in determining the conduct of its business. I do not believe that this would come in line with that case, anyhow.

I can not see anything that would lead to the conclusion that this is general legislation in the sense in which that term is used in the rules of the Senate, but I am perfectly willing to allow the Chair to pass on the matter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I take it for granted that there is no question but that the river and harbor bill is an appropriation bill in every sense of the word, and I do not want to take the time of the Senate to point to the decisions bearing out that question.

As to the question of whether or not this amendment is general legislation, I call your attention to the precedents of general legislation on river and harbor bills. I am not going to take very much of the time of the Senate, but I think the Chair, if he will read them, will come to the conclusion that this and similar amendments is general legislation without a question of a doubt, and it has been so decided by the Senate time and time again.

On page 161, I find the following:

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill (H. R. 28180) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

On the question to agree to the reported amendment, beginning on page 53, line 6, and extending down to and including line 6, page 55, as follows:

"The Secretary of War is hereby directed to make and enter into an agreement with the Municipal Electric Co., a public corporation, organized and existing under the laws of the State of Minnesota, for the purpose of utilizing the hydroelectric power developed by the surplus waters not needed for navigation by the dam described and provided for in House Document No. 741, Sixty-first Congress, second session, as adopted by Congress in the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes,' approved June 25, 1910"—

And so forth.

That is one particular electric-light plant, and that was ruled and passed upon by the Senate as to whether it was general legislation on an appropriation bill on February 20, 1913.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator? Do I understand that the Senator claims that what he read was general legislation?

Mr. SMOOT. The question was raised:

Mr. THOMAS raised a question of order, viz, that the amendment proposed is general legislation to an appropriation bill, and is therefore not in order under the rule.

The President pro tempore (Mr. Gallinger) submitted the question to the Senate, Is the amendment in order?

It was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; that is, that amendment was held in order on the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SMOOT. That it was not in order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. It was held in order. The Chair decided in the affirmative.

Mr. SMOOT. No; that it was general legislation, and that was the point that was made.

Mr. JONES of Washington. If the Senator is acting on that belief, all right.

Mr. SMOOT. There are three or four pages of decisions covering my contention. I do not know that it is really necessary to read them, as they are so plain.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to call his attention to this? The Senator has misread it. At the bottom of the page it says:

Mr. THOMAS raised a question of order, viz, that the amendment proposed is general legislation to an appropriation bill, and is therefore not in order under the rule.

The President pro tempore (Mr. Gallinger) submitted the question to the Senate, Is the amendment in order?

It was determined in the affirmative.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; the Senator is right on that, but I know that it is not necessary for me to go on and read this long list of precedents holding amendments similar to the pending one is general legislation on a river and harbor bill, because they have all been held as general legislation and in cases more specific in terms than this particular one.

The Senator says that this applies only to all those employed on river and harbor works. Why, of course it applies to all those employed on river and harbor works, and that is general. It makes no difference where located, whether in New York or San Francisco or any river in the United States; it applies to every person employed on them. It is just as general as it could possibly be, because it takes in every employee that is engaged upon this class of work. It does not say the employees upon any particular class of work, but it is the whole of the employees, and in my opinion it could not be more general than the wording of this amendment, and under the previous rulings of the Senate it is general legislation.

I am willing that the Chair shall rule upon it.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, if the Chair will turn to page 60 of the precedents, he will find a definition of general legislation that I think is the rule followed by the Senate. Citing from Bouvier's Law Dictionary:

General law (legislation), laws which apply to and operate uniformly upon all members of any class of persons, or places, or things, requiring legislation peculiar to themselves in the matters covered by the laws. Statutes which relate to persons and things as a class.

So I do not think the contention of the Senator from Washington can be sustained, that because this relates only to a class of persons it is not general. The precedent seems to be directly the opposite.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, I wondered, as I have listened to this discussion, whether another rule does not apply here, or at least a precedent that we have followed, I think, again and again in the Senate. Is this not a limitation upon an appropriation, and therefore not open to the objection that it is general legislation?

Mr. SMOOT. In what way would it be a limitation on an appropriation?

Mr. STERLING. Let me read a few of the lines here, beginning with line 8:

The Chief of Engineers, subject to the approval of the Secretary of War, shall have authority to adjust and settle all claims for damages or destruction caused by the above designated collisions, accidents, and so forth, in cases where the damage or expense does not exceed $500, and pay the same from the appropriation directly involved, and to report such as exceed $500 to Congress for its consideration.

It occurred to me that here, in any given case, where an appropriation is involved, and a collision, an accident, occurs, a claim for damages on that account is to be paid out of that appropriation which we have provided in this bill.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a privilege that that power is granted to the Secretary of War. That is exactly what the change of the law is, and it becomes general legislation. It does not apply to one accident; it applies to every accident that may happen. It does not apply to one person; it applies to all persons who may be engaged in that work.

If this is not general legislation, there never was general legislation.

Mr. STERLING. What does the Senator understand by the language "from the appropriation directly involved"? It means, does it not, that which is set apart for that particular project or enterprise? That is "the appropriation directly involved."

Mr. SMOOT. It changes the present law, as was said here the other day by the Senator from Minnesota. There is no doubt of that. If this is general legislation, then it has no business on an appropriation bill when a point of order is made against it, and I have made the point of order.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. STERLING. Yes.

Mr. LENROOT. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from South Dakota to the fact that, instead of this being a limitation, it is an extension. There is no limitation at all. There is no such authority at all now to pay money for these purposes, so it could not be a limitation. It is, in fact, an extension to the Secretary of War of authority that he does not have to-day.

Mr. STERLING. Mr. President, does not the Senator from Wisconsin understand, by the language "and pay the same from the appropriation directly involved," the part of a general appropriation—say twenty to twenty-four million dollars—that is set apart for that particular project? It comes out of the general appropriation, of course.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but no part of the $24,000,000 can be used for any such purpose now; and if that is so, how can the Senator say that this is a limitation?

Mr. STERLING. It can be used for the purpose of that particular project or enterprise at which the accident or collision occurs, where the damages arise.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but they could use it for this purpose, and so it could not be a limitation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FERNALD in the chair). The question under discussion is one upon which there may be a great divergence of opinion, as the Chair sees there is, by good lawyers of the Senate. The occupant of the chair, who is here temporarily, is not inclined to make a ruling on the matter but is disposed to leave it to the judgment of the Senate, and he will therefore put the question, Is the point of order well taken?

On a division, the Senate decided that the point of order was not well taken.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what does the Chair decide?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the point of order is not well taken. The Senate has so decided.

The question now is on the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. That completes the committee amendments.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 5, between lines 22 and 23, it is proposed to insert:

Warwick River, Va.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, this is simply to provide for a survey. My attention was called to this matter by the Member of Congress from this district, who informs me that Gen. Taylor, of the Army Engineers, and Gen. Heywood, who is commander at Camp Eustis, desire that this survey be made in order to facilitate the means of getting supplies at Camp Eustis. They think they will save a great deal of money if this is allowed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk. It relates to a survey, and is to be inserted after line 2 on page 9.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 9, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Outlet of Cass Lake, Minn., with a view of securing a navigable connection with the Mississippi River.

Mr. NELSON. This is simply to provide for a survey.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Minnesota whether that amendment was submitted to the committee for consideration?

Mr. NELSON. No; it has not been submitted to the committee for consideration.

Mr. KING. I inquire of the chairman whether it is his policy, and the policy of the committee, to permit to be added to appropriation bills of this character——

Mr. NELSON. This is simply asking for a survey. Cass Lake is one of the sources of the Mississippi River. It is desired to improve the channel from the lake, so that the farmers around that large lake who are raising a lot of potatoes can find an outlet by shipping them out on barges down the Mississippi River. That is the object of the amendment.

Mr. KING. I was about to put a question to the chairman of the committee——

Mr. NELSON. It is simply for a survey. If the Board of Engineers report against it, that is the end of it, and if they recommend it favorably, it has to go from the local engineer to the division engineer, and from him to the board of review, and from that to the Chief of Engineers, before it comes before the committee for consideration. It has to run through practically three tribunals.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator that I am entirely familiar with the modus operandi followed in respect to these matters. I have not read more than 25,000 pages of reports respecting rivers and harbors without getting some little information respecting their character and the methods employed to secure favorable reports upon little brooks and streams and creeks which can not be considered as arteries of commerce and upon which millions of dollars have been expended.

But if I may be permitted to return to the question which I have attempted to ask the chairman of the committee, is it the purpose and policy of the committee to permit, without any objection whatever, the placing upon bills of this character in the Senate any survey or any item or project which any Senator desires or cares to suggest?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned I do not know about these propositions which are presented. I do not know of any way by which I can learn about them, except through a report from the engineers or the statements of a Senator. When a Senator comes and states that he thinks a survey ought to be made, and that one has not been made within very recent years, I am perfectly willing to let it go on and get the facts here. If the Senator from Utah were to come to me and state that he thought a survey ought to be made of a river or a harbor in his State, if there were rivers and harbors in that State, I would feel perfectly justified in giving my consent to such a provision going into this bill.

We must not forget the character of these provisions. They are simply provisions calling for information to be presented to the Senate with reference to different propositions. They entail but very little expenditure and do not add to the appropriation in the bill. They furnish information upon which Congress will determine its future action as to whether a project is to be taken up or not.

As was brought out the other day, the engineers do not take this as an instruction, or even a suggestion, to report favorably; but they understand that it is simply a proposition calling upon them for an impartial and unbiased statement with reference to the facts of the situation.

The records show that during the last few years only about 7 per cent of the surveys we have ordered have been favorably reported upon or recommended by the engineers. Under those circumstances, and from the fact that I know nothing about the situation, as I said, and can learn nothing about it except through these reports and statements of engineers, I have followed the course we have always followed with reference to surveys, that when a Senator asked for them I have made no serious objection to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the present system does not permit that freedom and independence upon the part of the engineers and officials that are necessary to secure economy and a proper and serviceable river and harbor system. I do not have the confidence in the reports of the engineers and boards which act upon their reports that is manifested by the Senator from Minnesota and the chairman of this committee. Moreover, the records furnish numerous examples of the utter failure of scores of projects approved by the engineers, and upon which tens of millions of dollars have been expended, and there are examples showing that in the face of adverse recommendations by the engineers Congress has authorized the expenditure of large sums for the development of streams and rivulets which carry no commerce and never will be of advantage or service to the people. Indeed, there are hundreds of projects which have received the approval of the Engineers of the Army and the appellate board which passes upon their recommendations that had no merit, and for the development of which not a single dollar should have been appropriated. My belief is, after a careful examination of all the reported projects, that a majority of them were wholly unworthy and the money appropriated therein was wasted.

The Senator from Minnesota has just offered an amendment which calls for a survey of a local and unimportant project. In my opinion, it should not be a Federal charge. If the people residing in the vicinity of the lake referred to desire to improve the small stream flowing from the lake, they should undertake it themselves or the State should make the desired improvement.

I want to read a sentence or two from the proceedings of the Senate under date of February 20, 1913. The then Senator from Nevada, now deceased, Mr. Newlands, was discussing river and harbor bills, and the imperfect, inefficient, and wasteful system which had been employed by the Government in providing for the improvement of rivers and harbors. He was denouncing the policy of the Government, and that policy is the existing policy. Notwithstanding the criticisms of the Senator from Nevada, than whom there was no greater authority upon rivers and harbors and internal improvements in the United States, as well as the criticisms of Senator Burton, of Ohio, and other able men of the United States, including Mr. Roosevelt when President, Congress refused to adopt any reform and perpetuated the system which has been condemned by all persons who have intelligently and rationally and patriotically considered the subject of the development of water transportation and the improvement of rivers and harbors.

But let me recur to what was said by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota. There was a colloquy between the Senators from Minnesota and Nevada, and the Senator from Nevada then propounded a question to the Senator from Minnesota, who responded as follows:

Mr. President, in answer to the kindly question of the Senator from Nevada, I beg leave to say that in a general way the Senator has expressed my sentiments. I have come to the conclusion that we could do much better work and should squander—

Mark the word "squander"—the Senator's words were a condemnation of the system—less money if we appropriated a gross sum and placed it in charge of a board of five or seven competent Army engineers with power to determine what improvements should be made, and where, in our rivers and harbors.

Proceeding, the Senator said:

While a great many of the improvements we are making are fully justified in the interests of navigation, yet my observation has led me to believe that in a great many instances we really squander money. It is wasted on improvements that never ought to have been made, but what can we do? Representatives and Senators are clamorous; they introduce their bills, and it is utterly impossible to resist them.

What an indictment of the present policy of the Government in dealing with its waterways! And yet we blindly follow it; it finds expression in the present bill before us. No Senator, so far as I remember, has during this debate demanded a change in the manner of dealing with rivers and harbors. All seem satisfied, or at least no improved plan is presented for our acceptance or rejection. I should add, though, that the chairman of the committee has indicated a purpose to strike down in the future some of the obnoxious features of the present plan.

In a humorous way, let me inquire at this point, having in mind the statement which I have just read "that Senators and Representatives are clamorous at the introduction of bills and it is utterly impossible to resist them": How is it possible for us to "resist" the amendment just offered by the Senator from Minnesota, whom we all love and esteem? What can we do when he asks that a survey be made? What can the chairman of the committee do when the great Senator from Minnesota asks for an appropriation for a survey? The chairman of the committee does not resist the request and no other Senator has offered objection. Under the existing system perhaps an objection would be improper. The plan contemplates that Senators and Representatives shall, when the rivers and harbors bills are before the Senate for consideration, request that surveys or projects be made with a view to having the projects adopted as governmental undertakings. The residents of the various communities quickly learn that the mere asking for a survey of some creek or stream or lake will bring the needed legislation, and they, of course, will importune Senators and Representatives to take affirmative action. Individuals living upon some little stream unquestionably might be benefited by the expenditure of several thousands of dollars in cleaning its bed and in repairing its banks. If the Government will assume control of the stream and keep it in repair and maintain its banks it will perhaps bring some local advantage and will result in placing in circulation in the section where the improvement is made thousands and tens of thousands and perhaps hundreds of thousands of the public treasure.

The Senator proceeded:

I think it would require almost supreme power to infuse a new spirit into Representatives and Senators, as well as into the American people, to bring about a reform.

I think the work should first be started through our great newspapers and the magazines, from the pulpit, and along educational lines to infuse people with a new spirit, with less of the spirit of Mammon, so that we would all come to look upon this question just as we would if it were our own business.

Mr. President, the Senator understood the Herculean task in securing a reform of the abuses attending river and harbor appropriations. It will require "almost supreme power" to "bring about a reform." But let me urge the Senator to join in the effort to secure a reform. Now is the time to begin. Now is the time to practice economy and to introduce greater efficiency in administrative methods. From every quarter demands are being made for appropriations from the Federal Treasury. We should possess sufficient courage to resist such demands and there should be enough wisdom to effectuate changes in existing laws and policies that will result in economies and conduce to the general welfare.

Following the statement made by the distinguished Senator from Minnesota, Senator Newlands continued:

I call attention to the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota, who has long served upon the Commerce Committee of the Senate, who has had a large experience in the development of our rivers, who has served on committees that have made investigations of the Mississippi, the Missouri, and other rivers, and whose experience has probably been as large as that of any Member of this body. He testifies to the ineffectiveness of the present system, and the Senator from Ohio [Mr. Burton] has also testified to it. * * * He said there has been lack of care in the selection of projects and lack of care in methods. He speaks of the ineffectiveness of expenditures already made, but he also speaks of the experimental side of this question as if we had to go through a further period of experiment before we could agree upon an effective system.

In this connection let me read just a word from Senator Burton. In 1913 he said:

For years we have been struggling under a vicious system of river and harbor improvements. For instance, the river and harbor bill of 1910 contained items favoring 296 out of the 391 congressional districts. This bill was a masterpiece of geographical distribution and a striking tribute to the cohesive power of legislative logrolling.

I would have some fear of a rebuke were I to employ language so cutting and so condemnatory of Congress. It might be denominated unparliamentary. But having come from a former distinguished Senator, one who has been in public life for many years and has served in the House as chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and also upon the Commerce Committee of the Senate, I feel that I am warranted in calling attention to this language, strong and denunciatory though it be. He also said:

There are two ways of framing a river and harbor bill. The popular method of drawing a bill is to make such concessions to all the different States and localities that you will have an overwhelming support for the measure. The other method, and the right one, is to select those projects which would benefit the whole country and then finish them with promptness. The first method is irresistible. It will win every time—consult the wishes of the varied localities and projects of the country and they will all join together and pass a bill.

Mr. President, I stated a moment ago that I had examined thousands of pages of testimony relating to projects for which appropriations had been asked and obtained at the hands of Congress. I affirm again, as I have stated upon the floor of the Senate upon former occasions, that 50 per cent—and I think more—of the billion dollars which we have appropriated for rivers and harbors has been wasted. I think the criticism of the able Senator from Minnesota, that our system has been wasteful and inefficient, has been justified and warranted by the facts and by the records which have been presented to Congress and have been given to the public. Yet we are perpetuating the system. The experiences of the past, disappointing and nauseating though they have proven to be, fail to rouse us from our lethargy or stimulate us to higher resolves.

We listen to the criticisms of those who have studied the question in a scientific way. We obtain suggestions from them, and then we promptly pigeonhole their recommendations and proceed in the old, archaic, obsolete, destructive, wasteful, and extravagant way. Efforts have been made, Mr. President, to secure a system under which a competent board would function with full authority and power to select streams and projects for improvement, and to determine where the appropriations made by Congress shall be expended. Under this plan Congress would make an appropriation annually or whenever in its judgment it should be made, and the board or commission of scientific and trained men would expend the same at such places as in their judgment the needs of commerce demanded.

Mr. President, I submit that a perusal of the records, an examination of the little ditches and streams and rivulets that have received large appropriations at the hands of Congress, will fill with resentment and indignation any honest investigator. He will rise from a perusal of the record with an overwhelming conviction, an ineradicable one, that we have pursued a wasteful and vicious policy and have squandered between four and six hundred million dollars in so-called rivers and harbors improvements.

Of course, we all agree that the harbors of our country should receive adequate appropriations for their development. I think that it has been a mistaken policy that has led to the development of some of the harbors upon the Atlantic coast to the exclusion of harbors upon the Gulf coast. There is no reason why we should not have developed export centers in New Orleans and other points along the Gulf coast, but our railroad development and our appropriations have been all in the line of concentrating trade and traffic and commerce in the harbors of New York and one or two other eastern points.

The capitalists of New York, the interests of New York, the great railroad interests of the United States, apparently have determined that they would draw all of our export and import trade into the great metropolis of New York and a few other cities upon the eastern coast. We have ignored the southern ports. We have ignored the great port of Charleston, S. C., and we have trifled with the harbors upon the Gulf and the Pacific coast. It is time that we should adopt a rational, sane, and genuinely American policy, one that will increase our trade and commerce, develop all sections of our country, and tend to cheapen rates and promote prosperity in all sections of this Republic. Improvements must not be sectional. The welfare of all the people must be considered and a broad, liberal, and businesslike plan of procedure must be adopted and consistently followed.

I believe that the great waterways of our country should be improved and be made available for carrying the commerce of our country. The harbors upon our coasts should receive attention and rendered suitable for the ships that seek our shores. But I am opposed to this piecemeal, inefficient, wasteful, extravagant, vicious system of dealing with the great question of rivers and harbors improvements that has been followed by the American Congress for so many years.

I repeat that an examination of the records will show that a majority of the projects upon which appropriations have been expended ought never to have been surveyed and ought never to have received a dollar of appropriation. There are streams by the scores, if not by the hundreds, that never have borne commerce and never will be required for commercial uses. The reports furnish evidence of streams which have received large appropriations which carry but a few tons annually, some of them 20 tons, some of them 100 tons, and others a thousand tons or a few thousand tons.

One river, as I recall it, had an appropriation of more than $3,000,000; and yet, after years of development, the commerce upon that river for a given year was only 800 tons, and most of that consisted of underbrush and logs and waste timber.

I may say, in passing, that a majority of the streams for which appropriations have been made carry that sort of trade and commerce. Many are little creeks that have to be snagged out every year, streams so small that a few months will fill them with moss and underbrush. Some of the streams are so insignificant and unimportant that they are dry during a portion of the year; and yet they are "rivers, great arteries of commerce," demanding and receiving large sums from the Treasury of the United States.

Soberly and solemnly we declare that these little streams are necessary for the welfare of the people; that they are important in developing the commerce of the country. It is so ludicrous as to provoke laughter, if it were not for the serious aspect resulting from the waste of public money.

The Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] has just stated that a survey only is asked for and that there is no obligation to make an appropriation. Mr. President, the survey necessitates the expenditure of money. It calls for the services of a corps of engineers and their assistants. No survey can be made without the expenditure of money, and these surveys must be paid for by the Government of the United States. Why should not the States or communities, which feel that they have a project that is worthy of consideration, make the survey themselves, ascertain the facts, prepare a brief in respect to the merits of the project, submit scientific and technical information bearing upon the project, its necessity, its cost, the engineering difficulties, and problems to be encountered in the execution of the scheme or project, and present the entire matter to the committee or to some official or board of the Government?

If that step were taken hundreds of these unworthy projects would not be knocking here at the doors of Congress. But as long as the people know that they can have an investigation made at the hands of the Government by merely having their Senator or their Representative make the request for a survey, when they know that that will be done and their demand will be acceded to, of course, they will not undertake the work or make contribution thereto; they will insist that it is a national matter, one which the Federal Government should alone undertake.

Uncle Sam is regarded as the Atlas of the people, and he must, upon his bowed shoulders, carry all individual burdens, community responsibilities, and the obligations of the States. The feeling is that there need be no further initiative, no local or State pride, no community spirit. The spirit is that Congress should be appealed to upon all matters, that the Federal Government should open its Treasury and pour out the money wrung by taxation from the people to aid in all sorts of private schemes and ventures and experiments.

Mr. President, every faddist and doctrinaire, every selfish and unscrupulous individual who thinks that he can work the Government, comes here and demands that committees recommend and that Congress make appropriations or exercise the power of the Federal Government to aid in the consummation of the plan or scheme or fantastic idea suggested. Be it said to the discredit of our Government and by way of criticism of public officials that too often these wild and fantastic demands are acceded to. The record of appropriations for rivers and harbors shows that Congress has acceded to unrighteous and visionary and unpatriotic demands made by communities, individuals, and sections.

I repeat, why should we not ask the State or the community to make appropriations for these rivers and harbors, at least appropriations amounting to 50 per cent of the amount asked of the parent Government? If it is a great harbor, national in its operations, relating to the entire country, I can understand that in a case of that kind the local community might perhaps be immune from contribution and no exaction should be made of it; but where a little stream is brought to the attention of Congress and an appropriation is asked for it, a stream which is local in character, the benefits of which are local, provincial, limited to the people who live along its banks or in close proximity to it, there is no reason in the world why the Federal Government should be called upon to bear the burden of developing that stream if it is to be developed at all.

I have been unable to comprehend the logic of those who justify appropriations for little streams, local in character, and yet deny an appropriation to build a highway into a farming community to aid the farmers in transporting their products to the markets. If I happen to live upon a little stream 50 or 100 miles in length, and other people reside upon its banks, why should the Government maintain that stream in a condition of repair to float down the products of my farm and the products of the farms abutting upon the stream and refuse to aid in constructing highways or other means of transportation for the purpose of carrying the products of other farms that may be farther inland? If it is the duty of the Federal Government to transport the products of every individual to market, then there can be no discrimination or distinction between individuals who reside upon little creeks and individuals who may reside some distance in the interior and remote from water connection.

But the idea seems to prevail, under the vicious system which controls us and binds us, that any little creek, no matter how few reside upon it or in its vicinity, regardless of whether it is or can become interstate in character, should be the subject of cognizance by the Federal Government and the object of appropriation through the Rivers and Harbors Committee. The policy is wrong.

Mr. President, many of the American people, and all who fully investigate, will be against the present method of appropriation for rivers and harbors, against this indiscriminate assault upon the Treasury for these little creeks and streams, as long as the present method is adhered to. When we create a scientific body of technical, impartial men, men of standing and ability in the community, men who have the confidence of all parts of the country, and commit to them the making of surveys of the streams and the harbors that should be the subjects of development by the Federal Government, and commit to them the expenditure of whatever sums Congress feels the Government can afford to appropriate annually, and permit them, unhampered and unembarrassed by local influences, to make the selections and to expend the appropriations made, then the American people will be satisfied with river and harbor legislation, and with the conduct of Congress and the appropriations which shall be made.

After the pending amendment is disposed of I shall offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the pending bill. It is not my purpose to enter into a discussion of its provisions, because I realize that nothing which I can say will prevent the passage of the pending measure or modify or change the old discredited and indefensible system followed in dealing with rivers and harbors. Upon a number of occasions during the past three years I have called attention to the extravagant and, indeed, vicious policy which has been fastened upon the Government in dealing with appropriations for rivers and harbors. I discussed the question somewhat extensively on the 17th of February, 1919, when a similar measure to that now before us was under consideration. I insisted then, as I insist now, that there should be a radical change in the policy of the Government with respect to appropriations for rivers and harbors. I offered upon that occasion a substitute for the measure that was then before the Senate. It was in harmony with the recommendations of Senator Newlands and President Roosevelt, former Senator Burton, and the National Waterways Commission, which, under authority from Congress, had studied the question and submitted their report for the enlightenment of Congress and the country. The substitute which I offered then is as applicable now as it was upon that occasion, and with slight modifications I shall submit it within a few moments for the action of the Senate.

While I have the floor let me submit a few observations in explanation of the substitute. The pending bill as it came from the House called for $12,000,000 to be expended for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, to be expended for various projects under the direction of the Engineers of the War Department. The substitute calls for $12,000,000, to be immediately available, and to be expended under the direction of the Waterways Commission created by the act of Congress approved August 8, 1917. Senators will recall that the act referred to was sometimes called the Newlands Act. It created a Waterways Commission consisting of seven members, to be appointed by the President, at least one of whom was to be chosen from the active list of the Engineer Corps of the Army, at least one to be a hydraulic engineer from civil life, and the others to be selected either from civil life or public service. The act further provided that this commission should act under such rules and regulations as the President might prescribe and subject to the approval of the heads of the several executive departments concerned.

The duty of the commission was to bring into coordination and cooperation the engineering, scientific, and constructive bureaus, boards, and commissions of the several departments of the United States, as well as commissions created by Congress that relate to the study, development, or control of waterways and water resources and subjects related thereto, and to the development and regulation of interstate and foreign commerce, with a view to uniting such services in investigating, with respect to all watersheds in the United States, questions relating to the development, improvement, regulation, and control of navigation as a part of interstate and foreign commerce, including therein the related questions of irrigation, drainage, forestry, arid and swamp land reclamation, clarification of streams, regulation of flow, control of floods, utilization of water power, prevention of soil erosion and waste, storage, and conservation of water for agricultural, industrial, municipal, and other purposes. The commission was further charged with the duty of submitting a comprehensive plan for the development of waterways and the water resources of the United States, and was to make recommendations or modifications for the dismissal of any projects adopted theretofore or thereafter.

It will be observed that the scope of the labors of this commission were very broad. It was believed that there would be selected men of the highest engineering and technical skill; men whose character and standing would commend them to the confidence of the people. Such a commission could safely be intrusted with the expenditure of such sums as Congress might from time to time appropriate for the improvement of rivers and harbors of our country. As I have stated, recommendations had repeatedly been made by those who had given the subject earnest consideration that a commission or board of scientific and competent persons should be created and charged with the responsibility of making surveys and selecting such rivers and harbors as were necessary for the commerce of the country, and of expending upon the projects so selected the appropriations made by Congress. It is obvious that any plan that would commit to a commission of trained and competent persons the selection of projects for improvement and development and the completion of the same, uninfluenced by local or provincial considerations or local influences, would be a decided improvement over the present and past method of providing for the improvement of waterways and harbors.

A moment ago I read from a speech delivered by former Senator Burton in which he pointedly called attention to the present vicious system of selecting projects for Government development. He emphasized the fact that the "log-rolling" method had been the one adopted. We are all familiar with the methods by which millions of dollars have been drawn from the Public Treasury to erect public buildings in villages and towns of limited population. No one can defend the pork-barrel method under which appropriations have been obtained for rivers and harbors. No one can defend expenditures of millions and hundreds of millions of dollars upon so-called waterways in the United States. Of course, many projects were worthy. There are some waterways which should have been improved and upon which the expenditures were entirely proper. It is imperative that adequate harbors be provided for the commercial needs of our country. There will be no criticism of appropriations for the improvement of our harbors and inland rivers which will serve the people and conduce to their commercial and industrial prosperity. But as long as the present method is followed there will be resentment upon the part of millions of the American people and condemnation of the millions which will be called for and the greater part of which will be wasted.

The Senator from Minnesota and the Senator from Washington have stated that engineers passed upon the various projects referred to them by Congress, and that only a small percentage of the number of surveys authorized were finally adopted and received Federal appropriations. My recollection is that the number of projects which the engineers recommended exceeds the per cent suggested by the chairman of the committee. Whether that be true or not, the evidence is conclusive that a large proportion of the projects which do receive the approval of the engineering branches of the Government are wholly unworthy.

If I had time I could give to the Senate the names of scores and, indeed, hundreds of creeks and pools and streams and swamps and bayous upon which millions have been spent and which never have been and never will be of any benefit to the commerce of our country. The reports and records dealing with the subject under consideration are replete with illustrations of the methods employed in securing the approval of projects which call for millions and tens of millions of dollars and the construction of which can not be defended in any court of morals in the land. The present system makes for wastefulness and extravagance and is an invitation to localities to improperly extract money from the Public Treasury.

As long as the present system is perpetuated, under which waterway projects are approved, there will be waste and extravagance and inefficiency and the basis for charges of wrongdoing and misconduct, favoritism, and discrimination upon the part of the Government and its officials. Selfishness and human nature have cut a very important figure in the selection of projects in the past and in the huge appropriations made in behalf of many of the number. Streams that are purely local and upon which there never was and never will be any commerce carried have received immense sums for their development. Canals such as Hennepin, upon which $8,000,000 were expended, as well as other projects equally as bad, will be selected and developed and millions expended thereon if we adhere to the present condemned and improper system.

We have expended upon our internal waterways and harbors more than a billion of dollars. There is no question but what the commerce carried upon the waterways of our country is far less than it was many years ago. It would appear as though the commerce carried by our waterways decreased in proportion as the expenditures increased. I think I am within the bounds of truth in stating that there was more commerce carried upon the Mississippi River 50 years ago than at the present time.

Appropriations of a hundred millions of dollars have been expended for the improvement of the Mississippi River and yet its importance for commercial purposes has steadily declined. Writers who have investigated the appropriations made by the Government for our waterways have been filled with amazement upon examining projects for which appropriations have been made. They have not hesitated to charge that intrigues and misrepresentations and local and selfish interests have been instrumental in securing appropriations. It would seem that in the light of all the facts and the unimpeachable record that we have before us a reform would be inaugurated and a rational and scientific policy or system would be adopted for the improvement of our harbors and inland waterways. The time has come for the exercise in governmental affairs of the highest principles of morality and justice and sound business expediency. Too many of the public and too many of the public officials have been indifferent to the questions of efficiency and economy in public affairs. Local interests and local demands have too often influenced those who have had to do with governmental affairs. It is regrettable but it is nevertheless true that the American people have not learned the art of efficiency and economy in municipal or State or Federal affairs.

Persons of the highest integrity and morality have often, when they have been called upon to deal with public funds and public questions, applied a different rule from that which governed their conduct in their business dealings and relations with their fellow men. I have sometimes thought that public morality and public honesty and integrity were not as acute and as highly developed as that which found expression in the private dealings and relations between individuals.

What right have Congressmen or Senators to ask for appropriations for the improvement of some little creek or stream which never can be of importance as a carrier of commerce? A growing demand upon the Public Treasury calls for radical reforms in legislative action as well as in executive and ministerial conduct. The extravagance and inefficiency and wretched bungling and indefensible administration of public affairs have constituted an evil example for the people and have established precedents that are dangerous and destructive. I appeal to Senators to join in overturning the discredited and vicious system relating to the improvement of rivers and harbors which has fastened itself upon our Government.

I have suggested a broad and comprehensive plan which should be adopted for the improvement of the harbors and waterways of our country. In the execution of this plan the work should not be conducted in piecemeal fashion. Whenever any project has been approved it should be speedily completed and sufficient appropriation should be made for its completion. The policy which we have been pursuing, as I have stated, has been criminal and wasteful. Scores, if not hundreds, of projects were being contemporaneously developed. It is impossible with the machinery of the Government and the appropriations made to expeditiously complete all that were being developed. As a result we find even in projects upon which expenditures have been made for a long period of years that they are still incomplete. Much of the money expended has been wasted. The character of the project was such as to inevitably result in waste if the work were not speedily completed. Under the plan which I have suggested the board or commission would have full authority to complete the project. Indeed, it would be their duty to do so in the most expeditious manner.

The expenditure of the funds appropriated from time to time would be under their direction and they would have full authority, and it would be their duty to employ the same in order that projects commenced should not be carried along for indefinite periods in a haphazard, incompleted condition. As I have stated, we have expended nearly a hundred million of dollars in improving the Mississippi system. The improvements made extend over many years. If a comprehensive and scientific plan for the improvement of rivers and harbors had been adopted and the work for the execution of the plan prosecuted without interruption and in an expeditious manner millions of dollars would have been saved and lasting and permanent and valuable improvements would have been made, and the rivers as channels and instrumentalities for commerce would have measured up to the requirements and demands of the people of our country. The most vicious feature of the present system is that which calls for the appropriation for a small amount of work and dribbling expenditures upon a multitude of projects. Years elapse before they are completed, and indeed the work proceeds so slowly that the destructive processes countervail the expenditures and improvements made. If private enterprise were conducted along lines followed by the Government bankruptcy and ruin would attend the promoters of the same. It seems impossible to introduce sane and rational business methods into public affairs. Even where the personnel changes slightly and where civil service holds sway the same waste and extravagance and inefficiency rule.

Mr. President, most of the projects taken over by the Government possess peculiar local features and should be regarded in part as local enterprises. Projects of this kind should not be constructed by the Federal Government alone. The States and communities to be benefited should make contribution. They should cooperate with the Federal Government in the development of the streams and waterways which in a peculiar and definite way are beneficial to them. This bill should be so amended as to require the local communities and States receiving special and peculiar advantages to aid in the improvement for which appropriations are carried. It is manifest that rivers like the Mississippi are to be distinguished from little streams that can scarcely be said to be interstate in character. There are scores of streams, many of them called rivers, which are but a few miles in length and which are used, if used at all, only by but a few persons who live upon the banks of the streams or in close proximity thereto. Of course, as I have insisted, most of the streams of this character ought not to be taken over by the Federal Government nor should appropriations be made thereon by Congress for their development, but if Congress shall go to such extreme lengths in expending the public funds upon these local waterways, then the States or local communities should be required to make contribution of at least 50 per cent of the cost involved in the plan of the improvement adopted.

Mr. President, the substitute which I shall offer strikes at the foundation of the discredited system under which we are now operating. I regret that the Senate evinces no enthusiasm for it or for any change in the plan for dealing with the harbors and waterways of our country, but I make the prediction that we shall soon be compelled to abandon the wasteful and unscientific and absurd policy which has cost our country hundreds of millions of dollars, and to adopt a broad, comprehensive, and rational system, one that will be adequate for the needs of the people and consistent with wise and statesmanlike policies.

I had hoped that the Republican Party when it came into power would profit by the mistakes of the party with which I am identified, and that they, with broader vision than that which we possessed, would submit a plan which would meet the needs of the hour and rise to the dignity of a rational American plan. I had such confidence in the distinguished Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES]—a man of the highest patriotism; a man who deserves well of his State and of the country because of his ability and devotion to duty—I had hoped that he, knowing the weakness of the old system, its imperfections—indeed, its viciousness—would present a plan that would remedy and indeed fully meet the requirements of the hour.

Mr. JONES of Washington rose.

Mr. KING. Let me complete the sentence. I grant that the bill which the Senator has reported has the germs of improvement, and I believe that those germs will fructify and bear fruit; but the Senator ought to have evolved a perfected system along the lines of recommendation so frequently made in the past, along the lines pointed out by Mr. Roosevelt, and by the commission which was appointed to investigate this subject, in the elaborate report found in Senate document, volume 15. I am sure if the Senator had presented a system along those lines and urged it with the ability and sincerity which characterize him in all things, he would have commanded a majority of the votes upon both sides of the Chamber.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me just a word——

Mr. KING. I yield. I have concluded.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will merely take a moment.

I appreciate very much the kind words of the Senator from Utah, although I do not feel that they are entirely deserved. I simply wish to say that this bill is framed merely and solely for the purpose of carrying on works which are already under way; works that have been adopted by Congress and have been begun under appropriations heretofore made by Congress. Whether the action in these cases was wise or not it is not for me to say; but the work is under way, and the question is, which is the wisest course to follow—to let the work go down or to carry it on?

There is not any pork in this bill; no man can claim that there is. There is not a single new project in the bill. As I have said, it is simply to carry on work that has already begun and as to which the chances are that we would lose much more than we would save if we should stop our appropriations.

There is one provision in the bill of which I have been long in favor and of which many Senators on the floor have expressed themselves as being in favor. I refer to the provision that looks toward doing one of the things which the Senator from Utah has suggested, and that is to bring about the cooperation of communities, of localities, in carrying on projects and to require them to show their good faith in the project before it is undertaken by Congress. That is a very important matter, and it is one of the things which the Senator has urged.

I will state to the Senator my personal views with reference to one or two other matters, which I hope may be worked out in the next river and harbor bill, which will probably be a bill along constructive lines and not simply a bill to carry on work that is already under way. I am in accord with the principle of what the Senator has suggested. I doubt the necessity, however, of the creation of a new organization, but personally I am prepared to say that I am in favor of an appropriation by Congress of such sum as it thinks ought to be expended in the development of our rivers and harbors and the placing of that sum in the hands of the engineers of the Army, to be used in any way that they deem best and wisest for the commerce of the United States.

I believe that we shall get better results from such a system than in any other way. Of course, Congress will need to pass upon the projects that are to be taken up—that is, to pass upon the projects that we deem worthy of prosecution—and then give to the engineers sufficient money to carry on the projects that are most urgent and in the best and wisest and most economical manner, without any logrolling or anything of the sort; leaving it to their discretion and judgment from the knowledge they have as to what is the best and wisest thing to do.

I am also in favor, and have long been in favor—and I hope we may incorporate such a provision in the next rivers and harbors bill—when Congress provides for any project of any considerable size of not appropriating any money for it until we are prepared to carry it on to completion. For instance, take the Ohio River: If there is any river in this country upon which the wisdom of appropriating for the improvement of waterways can be demonstrated it ought to be the Ohio River, flowing, as it does, through a great beehive of industry and development. We ought to provide for the completion of that project and not have it dribble along from year to year, appropriating small sums of money, and in the end really doubling the cost of the improvement. As I have stated, I am in favor, when we undertake projects of that kind, of providing for their completion by the continuing-contract system, so that they may be carried on just as expeditiously as it is possible to do and get them finished. In the case of the Ohio River such a policy will demonstrate when the improvement is completed—and it can not be demonstrated before that time—the benefit of such an appropriation upon large rivers of that kind, which we hope may develop into great arteries of commerce, and which, I think, we can develop into great arteries of commerce.

Mr. President, that is all I propose to say at this time. That, in general, is what I hope to see worked out in the very near future.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, several days ago, when the pending bill was being read, section 12, which, through inadvertence, had been reported as a committee amendment, was reached and an objection was made to it by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. POMERENE]. It developed that not a quorum of the committee was present when the amendment was passed upon, and at the request of the Senator from Ohio it was withdrawn.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator is somewhat mistaken in regard to the matter. It was not, in fact, reported as a committee amendment, but was printed as such by mistake.

Mr. SWANSON. It was, through a mistake, printed as a committee amendment, no quorum of the committee, as I understand, being present when it came up there, and it was, at the request of the Senator from Ohio, who wanted to look into the matter to see whether it was such an amendment as ought to be passed, withdrawn by the chairman of the committee. I saw the Senator from Ohio before he left the city and he advised me that he had seen the Secretary of War and that he did not wish the amendment to be delayed on account of his absence and did not care to urge any objection to its adoption.

I will state to the Senate what the amendment is. In dredging the harbor at Alexandria, Va., it became necessary for the Government to deposit the sand taken out of the bottom of the harbor on some submerged land near by, so it was deposited in Battery Cove, thereby making about 46 acres of land. The question arose as to whether the Government did not acquire the title to the made land on account of filling it in. The riparian owners insisted that the made land belonged to them, and I presume their contention is correct, because I do not think the Government can, by depositing material in front of a man's land and thus making additional land, deprive a man of his right to the land so made. When the war came on there happened to be some shipyards at Alexandria which could be enlarged and developed; and, in order to secure a plant there capable of building ships, an agreement was entered into between the Secretary of War and the shipbuilding company and the owners of the riparian rights that the title to this land—46 acres in extent—should be determined by a suit in court. That suit is now pending. It was agreed that if the title should be determined to be in the riparian owners $70,000 should be paid to them, and that if the Government won the suit $70,000 should go to the Government.

In the meantime the land was rented. It was estimated that the land was worth $70,000, or about $1,500 an acre. The private owners agreed that that was a fair price, and the Government agreed that it was a fair price. Then the Government instituted a friendly suit to determine the title to the land, the rental in the meantime being fixed at $4,200 a year, or 6 per cent on the agreed price of the land. The Secretary of War rented it for five years. He also agreed that the shipbuilding plant should have the right to purchase it, so far as the Government was concerned, for $70,000, and the private owners, claiming the riparian rights, made a similar agreement in the event they obtained title. The shipbuilding company erected buildings on the land, but the Secretary of War had no authority to sell the land without an act of Congress. He has written a letter here asking Congress to approve that contract, and in case the Government should win the suit—which I think is a very remote probability—that the $70,000, which is held in trust, and the rental based on the $70,000, shall go to the Government, and that the shipbuilding company shall have the title to the land.

The necessity for the adoption of the amendment at this time is due to the following circumstances: The shipbuilding company expect to make this yard a private shipyard. They will soon complete the work they are doing for the Government, and they are desirous of floating a loan on this property. They erected on it under the agreement I have indicated about a million and a half dollars' worth of buildings, and they can not float the loan and develop the property unless the agreement with the Secretary of War is confirmed by the Congress. If there is any objection to it, I should like to have the letter of the Secretary of War read, although it has been read once. It states the matter clearly.

As to the Government getting a good price in case it obtains title, that is established by the report of the Army officers and by the fact that the private individuals agreed that in case their title was held superior to that of the Government they would take the amount agreed upon. It is a tripartite agreement between these parties, and under it the shipyard was constructed.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

Mr. SWANSON. Certainly.

Mr. KING. Should not this matter be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. SWANSON. No; it is a question of river and harbor improvement. It is the most remarkable proposition that I ever heard of, in a way—that the Government, by improving a river and depositing sand in front of a man's land, can deprive him of getting to the water; but there is some little question about it, on account of the District of Columbia and its cession. Consequently, to make the title clear, the Government has brought a suit to obtain possession of the land, which is in the possession of these private owners, and they have made an agreement that they would abide by the result.

It is simply a question of carrying out the agreement with the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, what river does this improve, or what harbor does it improve?

Mr. SWANSON. Alexandria City.

Mr. SMOOT. That is not a harbor.

Mr. SWANSON. Alexandria Harbor was improved in order to provide a certain depth, and it became necessary to deposit the sand in front of some land that jutted into the Potomac; and on that account the Government thought possibly they acquired title to that 46 acres, to the exclusion of the riparian owners.

Mr. SMOOT. It is just as clear as mud, Mr. President; and I will not make a point of order, because it would be overruled, anyhow.

Mr. SWANSON. The amendment does not propose general legislation. I do not suppose the Senator will claim that it does propose general legislation.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no need of making a point of order against general legislation if it is going to be immediately referred to the Senate, to decide the question, because that has been done this afternoon.

Mr. SWANSON. By not listening to the discussions for about 15 or 20 minutes, Senators will sometimes destroy great enterprises. The enterprises of this country are entitled to some consideration. Here is a great shipyard, employing four or five thousand people. Its ability to continue is dependent upon this amendment. Here is the Government in good faith making an agreement with private parties during the war by which these people put their buildings on this land. Now, in order to float a loan, they simply ask that the Government shall keep faith with them. If the Senator will listen to the letter of the Secretary of War, it will not take 10 minutes to read it.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want to take the time of the Senate even to listen to it, and I am not going to make the point of order upon it. I would not do so even though it were a claim upon an appropriation bill. I am not going to make any point of order. Anything can go on this bill. It does not make a particle of difference. I am not going to object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HARRISON. I offer as an amendment a new section to be known as section 6.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add to the bill a new section to be known as section 6, and to read as follows:

That as to the lands surveyed, investigated, and reported on in accordance with a provisions of the river and harbor act approved July 25, 1912, a full report of which is set out in House Document 1010, Sixty-second Congress, third session, wherein the Mississippi River Commission recommends that the title to said lands be acquired by the Government for use in river improvement, the owner of any of said lands may file petition in the Court of Claims, and in the adjudication thereof said court shall ascertain and determine whether the Government is equitably liable or responsible, and if so, for what proportion and to what extent for damage to or destruction of such lands as a result of the construction of levees or other improvements of said river, and render judgment therefor. In the trial of said suits, said court shall permit any party who, at any time since 1890, owned or held title to said lands or any interest therein, and who has become dispossessed thereof by reason of foreclosure proceedings, or otherwise compelled to sacrifice title thereto as a result of said injuries, to appear as a party claimant by filing petition therein setting up their former interest therein, and said court shall consider the claims of all of said parties and render judgment for whatever amount said court considers equitably or justly due the respective parties, but in no case shall any judgment exceed the proportion fixed by said court, and the payment of such judgment shall thereafter release the United States from further liability for any damage to said lands as a result of constructing improvements along or adjacent to said river.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, I feel that I must make the point of order against that amendment.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, may I say to the Senator from Washington that I offered the other day the amendment known as the Williams amendment that was adopted by the Senate and placed on the river and harbor bill at the last session. That amendment sent these claims to the Court of Claims for adjudication. Objection was raised by the Senator from Washington that the court in that instance would not pass upon the question whether or not these people had a just claim, and he did not think it went far enough. I have modified the amendment so that I thought it might meet the objection raised by the Senator from Washington, and the Senator will note from reading it that the amendment I now propose says:

And in the adjudication thereof, said court shall ascertain and determine whether the Government is equitably liable or responsible—

That was not in the other amendment at all. The other amendment just assumed that the Government was liable, and we assumed that because there has been commission after commission, and the Army Engineers time and again since 1894 have held that the Government should do something for these people who have been aggrieved.

This amendment goes further:

Said court shall ascertain and determine whether the Government is equitably liable or responsible, and, if so, for what proportion and to what extent.

It does not even say that the Government shall be liable for the whole amount, but that the court may decide for what proportion and to what extent—for damage to or destruction of such lands as a result of the construction of levees or other improvements of said river, and render judgment therefor.

May I say to the Senator from Washington, also, that here is a report that the Senator has before him, the report of the Mississippi River Commission. I want to read just a part of it:

The attention of Congress has been called in former reports, beginning as far back as 1894, to the situation of the narrow and irregular strip of land lying between the Mississippi River and the highlands east of it between Vicksburg and Baton Rouge, a distance of 234 miles by the river.

Then, farther down, it says:

The case is manifestly one for legislative rather than judicial treatment. Relief in some form ought in justice to come from Congress and the State legislature in cooperation. But such cooperation would be so difficult to attain that it is hardly worth the thought.

They are talking about getting some cooperation from the States.

Meanwhile the litigation drags its slow length along, the lives of the landowners are passing away, and hope deferred is making their hearts sick.

Even a cold-blooded Army engineer makes such a statement as that.

The situation is pathetic and distressing in the highest degree. That these people should be condemned to perpetual inundation without possibility of relief or redress for the sake of an improvement from which their fellow citizens are enjoying great benefits is intolerable to any man's sense of justice.

And then follows their recommendation.

I want also to call to the Senator's attention the fact that this is not the first time this has been done; but, as the Senator knows—and I have here the debates in that case, known as the Fox River proposition, up in Wisconsin—the Congress took care of the people who were hurt by virtue of the overflow of the river.

This matter has been investigated so much, and the reports have all been unanimous about it. It does not take any money out of the Treasury of the United States. It allows the matter to go to the Court of Claims, and have it say whether or not these people have any equities; and I hope the Senator will not make a point of order.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the only thing about this that is really embarrassing to me is the embarrassing situation to the Senator from Mississippi. I remember that his colleague [Mr. WILLIAMS] had substantially this amendment—at least, as he introduced it the other day—placed upon the river and harbor bill some little time ago. There was not any point of order made. There was not any special discussion. It went on in the Senate. Of course, it did not stay on the bill in conference.

I know that the Senator has given a great deal of attention to this matter, and that he has put forth every effort that a Senator could put forth to have this measure incorporated in this bill; but it involves so much that I do not feel that it should go on this bill, especially on the floor of the Senate. The whole proposition ought to be considered by a committee. It may involve the United States in an appropriation or an expenditure of several millions of dollars. The engineers, in their report, state that it would probably be something over $6,000,000, estimating the amount at $10 an acre.

Mr. HARRISON. If the Government should purchase it.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Yes; if the Government were to purchase it. Under those circumstances, I feel that it would be justice to the Senator for me to make the point of order against it. He has done everything he could do, so far as that is concerned. So I make the point of order that it is not only legislation upon an appropriation bill, but that it is in the nature of a claim that has not been estimated for and has not been recommended by any standing committee.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, I am quite sure that the point of order is well taken. I had hoped, however, that the Senator would not make it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, and move its adoption as a substitute for the pending bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment, in the nature of a substitute, will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed, as a substitute, to insert the following:

That the sum $12,000,000 be, and is hereby, appropriated for the fiscal year 1921, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, to be expended under the direction of the Waterways Commission created by the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved August 8, 1917, for necessary and proper construction, completion, repair, preservation, and maintenance of harbors, river channels, canals, embankments, levees, wharves, and water terminals within the United States, its Territories and possessions.

SEC. 2. That the floating plant, consisting of dredges, barges, towboats, snagboats, and all other equipment under the control of the Mississippi River Commission and of the Chief of Engineers of the Army, is hereby placed within the control, use, and possession of said Waterways Commission to carry out the provisions of this act.

SEC. 3. That the Mississippi River Commission created by the act approved June 28, 1879, and the Board of Engineers created by section 3 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved June 13, 1902, shall be abolished and terminated at the end of the present fiscal year, and that after the 30th day of June, 1919, said Waterways Commission shall become invested with all the powers and duties presently exercised by the Chief of Engineers of the Army, the Mississippi River Commission, and said Board of Engineers with respect to the maintenance and improvement of the harbors and waterways within the United States, its Territories, and possessions.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

Mr. REED. I move that the figures "$24,000,000" be stricken from the bill, and in lieu thereof that the figures "$27,000,000" be inserted.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Of course, Mr. President, I shall desire to have a yea and nay vote on that amendment. I hope the Senator will not insist upon the amendment. The Senate has already voted on the proposition in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. REED. Will the Senator say to me that he believes it impossible to put it through Congress?

Mr. JONES of Washington. Absolutely.

Mr. REED. In view of that statement I will not insist on the amendment. I simply desire to say that I regard $24,000,000 as inadequate, but I am not going to insist upon the amendment, although I believe enough votes could possibly be mustered to pass it. I am not going to insist upon it, because if the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, who is to be chairman of the Senate branch of the conferees, is of the opinion that it can not be accomplished, I see nothing to be gained by putting the item in. I am particularly constrained to take this view because I fear that the chairman of the committee would not very vigorously contend for $27,000,000 if we got it in the bill.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will say to the Senator that if the Senate should put it in I would contend strongly for it, and I would be perfectly willing, as far as I am concerned, to have those who have advocated the proposition go on the conference. But I really think we will get even more favorable results out of the conference by an appropriation of $24,000,000 than we would get with one of $27,000,000.

Mr. REED. I will not insist on the amendment. I feel that the sum allowed is inadequate, and I have expressed myself on that subject; but $24,000,000 is so much better than the amount carried in the bill as it came from the House that possibly it is the best we can do at this time.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I call up House bill 13677, making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems, and so forth.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13677) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems, and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE NICHOLS OF MICHIGAN.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. NICHOLS, late a Representative from the State of Michigan, and transmitted resolutions of the House thereon.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following resolutions of the House of Representatives, which were read:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES,
April 26, 1920.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. NICHOLS, a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

Resolved, That, as a further mark of respect, this House do now adjourn.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I offer the following resolutions and ask for their adoption.

The resolutions (S. Res. 353) were read, considered by unanimous consent, and unanimously agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. NICHOLS, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to take order for the superintending of the funeral of Mr. NICHOLS at Detroit, Mich.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Under the second resolution, Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. KEYES were appointed as the committee on the part of the Senate.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased Representative, I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was unanimously agreed to; and (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 27, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, April 26, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

O Thou invisible Spirit, a living presence, ever working in and through the minds and hearts of Thy children to larger life and nobler achievements—Lord of life and Lord of death.

The ties of kinship and friendship are deep and abiding, hence our hearts are bowed in sorrow and grief because a faithful Member of this legislative body has been unexpectedly removed by death.

Come close to us and the precious mother in whose arms he expired. May the blessed hope of the immortality of life and love assuage her grief and our sorrows.

The sands of life run swiftly and we know not the hour when the summons may come. May the experiences of the now fit us for the experiences of the then, and may the faith, hope, and love inherent in our souls abide with us now and evermore.

No one is so accursed by fate,
No one so utterly desolate,
But some heart, though unknown,
Responds unto his own.

Responds, as if with unseen wings,
An angel touched its quivering strings,
And whispers, in its song,
"Where hast thou stayed so long!"

Thus in Christ the Lord we pray. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of Friday, April 23, 1920, was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

LOAN OF COTS AND BLANKETS TO CONFEDERATE VETERANS.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of H. J. Res. 336, authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Albert Sidney Johnston Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 1820, Fort Worth, Tex., 100 cots and blankets for the use of Confederate veterans at the reunion of said camp June 24 to 27, inclusive, 1920.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of a joint resolution, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to loan, in his discretion, to the Albert Sidney Johnston Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 1820, Fort Worth, Tex., in their encampment to be held at Hodgkins Springs, near Fort Worth, Tex., from June 24 to June 27, inclusive, 1920, 100 cots and blankets: Provided, That no expense shall be caused the United States Government by the delivery and return of said property, the same to be delivered to the commander of said Albert Sidney Johnston Camp at such time prior to the holding of said encampment as may be agreed upon by the Secretary of War and the commander of said camp: Provided further, That the Secretary of War, before delivering said cots and blankets, shall take from the commander of said camp a good and sufficient security for the safe return of said property in good order and condition, and the whole to be without expense to the United States Government.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the joint resolution?

There was no objection.

Mr. LANHAM. I understand this is on the Union Calendar. I ask unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent having been granted, it will be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, this resolution is in the usual form, simply authorizing the loan of 100 cots and blankets for the Confederate Reunion to be held at Hodgkins Springs, near Fort Worth, Tex., June 24 to June 27, inclusive, 1920. It is without expense of any character whatever to the Government, and the loan is to be made only upon the giving of satisfactory security by the commander of the camp.

Mr. KAHN. The resolution has a unanimously favorable report from the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LANHAM. I thank the gentleman for making that statement.

Mr. LONGWORTH. May I ask the gentleman, is it the policy of the Committee on Military Affairs to limit the loan of such articles to the veterans of the Confederate and Union Armies?

Mr. KAHN. To those veterans, and also those of the Spanish-American War, and veterans of the World War.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the passage of the resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. LANHAM, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed was laid on the table.

REQUEST TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, to-morrow is the ninety-eighth anniversary of the birth of Gen. Grant. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special order for to-morrow I be permitted to speak for 30 minutes on that occasion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special order already agreed to for to-morrow he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on Gen. Grant. Is there objection?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I infer from what the gentleman says that his speech will relate to Gen. Grant.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Absolutely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] may be privileged to address the House for 30 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special order just agreed to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Reserving the right to object, how many speeches have we already set for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the special order for addresses provides for five speeches to-morrow.

Mr. DYER. Three from the Republican side and two from the Democratic side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the information of the Chair.

Mr. DYER. For the present I object to any more speeches to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri objects.

COTTON.

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD to-day by inserting therein a short resolution adopted by the Mississippi Valley Association, in St. Louis, on April 20.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD the resolution referred to. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. What does it refer to?

Mr. SANDERS of Louisiana. It is a resolution adopted by the Mississippi Valley Association, in St. Louis, on April 20, relative to its views on a pending amendment to the agricultural bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The resolution is as follows:

Resolution No. 1.

Whereas there has been adopted by the Senate an amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill, and which is now before the conference committee, and which, if adopted, will restrict the grades of cotton tenderable on contract, and on which amendment no opportunity for hearing has been provided: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the president of the Mississippi Valley Association be instructed to send the following telegram to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the chairman of the Agricultural Committees of both Houses:

"In view of its vital importance to the cotton producers and other cotton interests of the Mississippi Valley, and that of the Nation, we respectfully request and urge that no final action be taken on the Comer amendment to the Agricultural appropriation bill without a full and public hearing."

Adopted by the committee on resolutions.

HARRY A. BLACK,
Chairman, Galveston, Tex.
R. H. FAXON,
Secretary, Des Moines, Iowa.

Unanimously adopted by the convention April 20, 1920.

HARRY H. MERRICK,
President Mississippi Valley Association, Chicago, Ill.
J. B. MORROW,
Executive Secretary Mississippi Valley Association, Cincinnati, Ohio.

DEATH OF REPRESENTATIVE NICHOLS OF MICHIGAN.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to announce the death of my colleague, Hon. CHARLES A. NICHOLS, of Michigan, in his home in this city last evening. On a subsequent occasion I shall ask that a day be set aside for proper services in memory of the deceased. For the present I present the following resolutions and move their adoption:

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 535.

Resolved, That the House has heard with profound sorrow of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. NICHOLS, a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That a committee of 18 Members of the House, with such Members of the Senate as may be joined, be appointed to attend the funeral.

Resolved, That the Sergeant at Arms of the House be authorized and directed to take such steps as may be necessary for carrying out the provisions of these resolutions, and that the necessary expenses in connection therewith be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these resolutions to the Senate and transmit a copy thereof to the family of the deceased.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolutions.

The resolutions were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the Chair will appoint the following committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. DOREMUS, Mr. MICHENER, Mr. SMITH of Michigan, Mr. HAMILTON, Mr. MAPES, Mr. KELLEY of Michigan, Mr. CRAMTON, Mr. FORDNEY, Mr. MCLAUGHLIN of Michigan, Mr. CURRIE of Michigan, Mr. SCOTT, Mr. JAMES, Mr. MCFADDEN, Mr. IRELAND, Mr. MCARTHUR, Mr. WHITE of Kansas, Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado, and Mr. JOHNSON of Mississippi.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. DOREMUS. Mr. Speaker, as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 12 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Tuesday, April 27, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS, ETC.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental and deficiency estimates of appropriation required by the Lighthouse Service for the fiscal years 1919 and 1920 (H. Doc. No. 740); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting communication from the Secretary of the Navy submitting an estimate of appropriation to pay claims for damages by naval vessels adjusted by the Navy Department (H. Doc. No. 741); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting copy of communication from the Secretary of the Interior submitting an amended estimate of appropriations required by the Bureau of Education for the support of reindeer stations in Alaska, fiscal year 1921 (H. Doc. No. 742); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting supplemental estimates of appropriations required by the Department of State for the fiscal year 1920 (H. Doc. No. 743); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. MAYS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 430) to authorize the exchange of certain lands within the Fishlake National Forest, Utah, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 870), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the resolution (H. Res. 159) to direct the Secretary of the Interior to report upon the suitability, location, cost, if any, and advisability of securing a national redwood park, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 871), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII,

Mr. MAYS, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (S. 429) to authorize an exchange of lands with Henry Blackburn, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 869), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. SIMS: A bill (H. R. 13785) to amend sections 3 and 6 of the act of July 11, 1916, entitled "An act to provide that the United States shall aid the States in the construction of rural post roads, and for other purposes," as amended by sections 5 and 6 of the act of February 28, 1919, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes"; to the Committee on Roads.

By Mr. EVANS of Montana: A bill (H. R. 13786) to amend the revenue act of 1918 in regard to the computation of surtax on the income of individuals and the computation of war profits and the excess-profits tax on the income of corporations; to the Committee on Ways and Means.

SENATE.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we thank Thee for all the forces and agencies that equip us for successful toil in this great day in which Thou hast given to us our lives. We thank Thee for the wealth, for the scholarship, for the progressive spirit of our age and Nation, and above all we thank Thee for those spiritual qualities that make us brothers in the highest sense, and that render us capable of facing the great spiritual problems of our age. Grant us to hold close to Thyself that we may perform our functions as in God's sight, with God's fear in our hearts, to work out the destinies of the Nation according to the will of God. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Reading Clerk proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when on request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by D. K. Hempstead, its enrolling clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 336) authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Albert Sidney Johnston Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 1820, Fort Worth, Tex., 100 cots and blankets for the use of Confederate Veterans at the reunion of said camp June 24 to 27, inclusive, 1920; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. PHELAN presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from Fred S. Bebergal, department adjutant, American Legion, of San Francisco, Calif., praying for the enactment of legislation granting additional bonus to ex-service men, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. KNOX presented a petition of the Child Welfare League, of Waynesburg, Pa., praying for the enactment of legislation providing for the public protection of maternity and infancy, which was referred to the Committee on Public Health and National Quarantine.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Monessen, Pa., and a memorial of sundry citizens of New Castle, Pa., remonstrating against the enactment of legislation to exclude certain foreign publications from second-class mailing privileges, which were referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Pittsburgh, Pa., praying for the enactment of a daylight-savings law, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Easton, Pa., praying for the adoption of the units of the metric system as the exclusive standard of weights and measures, which was referred to the Committee on Standards, Weights, and Measures.

He also presented a petition of the Travelers' Club of Pittsburgh, Pa., and a petition of the Women's Auxiliary Unit of Sewickley Valley Post, No. 4, American Legion, of Sewickley, Pa., praying for the establishment of a Department of Education, which were referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CURTIS, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 5163) authorizing certain tribes of Indians to submit claims to the Court of Claims, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 548) thereon.

He also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

A bill (S. 3998) authorizing any tribes or bands of Indians of California to submit claims to the Court of Claims (Rept. No. 549); and

A bill (H. R. 11024) to amend an act entitled "An act making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914," approved June 30, 1913 (Rept. No. 550).

Mr. NEW, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 174) authorizing the completion of the Liberty Theater at Camp Knox, Ky., submitted an adverse report thereon, which was agreed to, and the joint resolution was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (S. 3318) for the relief of Willis B. Cross, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 554) thereon.

Mr. WADSWORTH, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13274) to convey to the Big Rock Stone & Construction Co. a portion of the military reservation of Fort Logan H. Roots, in the State of Arkansas, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 556) thereon.

Mr. CAPPER, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 515) to correct the military record of Charles K. Bond, alias Kimball W. Rollins, reported it with an amendment and submitted a report (No. 557) thereon.

BAYOU BARTHOLOMEW BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 12956) extending the time for constructing a bridge across the Bayou Bartholomew, in the State of Arkansas, and I submit a report (No. 537) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge authorized by act of Congress approved January 15, 1914, to be built across the Bayou Bartholomew, in the State of Arkansas, by Ashley County, are hereby extended one and three years, respectively, from the date of the approval hereof.

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

RED RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. CALDER. From the Committee on Commerce, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 13253) to grant the consent of Congress to the Elmer Red River Bridge Co. to construct a bridge across the Red River, and I submit a report (No. 552) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the consent of Congress is hereby granted to the Elmer Red River Bridge Co., to be composed of the following members, namely: B. F. Flowers and C. H. Harp, of Elmer, Jackson County, Okla., and W. T. Gibbons, of Odell, Wilbarger County, Tex., and their successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge and approaches thereto across the Red River at a point suitable to the interests of navigation, near the southeast corner of section 24, township 1 south, range 21 west of Indian meridian, Jackson County, Okla., to a point south in Wilbarger County, Tex., in accordance with the provisions of the act entitled "An act to regulate the construction of bridges over navigable waters," approved March 23, 1906.

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

NATIONAL EDUCATION ASSOCIATION.

Mr. STERLING. From the Committee on the Judiciary, I report back favorably without amendment the bill (H. R. 10917) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States," by adding thereto an additional section, and I submit a report (No. 553) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask the Senator if it is the unanimous report of the committee?

Mr. STERLING. It is a unanimous report of the committee. There was no objection to it. It simply proposes to amend the act incorporating the National Education Association so as to permit of a representative body of delegates of this great association of over 40,000 members. When it comes to the election of officers or the transaction of any business at the annual meeting, the association is confronted with the difficulties incident to so great a membership scattered throughout the entire country.

The present system permits those who are near the place of meeting to control. There are sections of the country not represented, or at least not well represented, at those meetings. The national association have had this matter before them again and again, and have decided that the only practicable way out of the difficulty is to be empowered to amend their by-laws, so as to permit of meetings of representatives of the association to carry on and transact the business of the association.

Mr. THOMAS. Does not the Senator think this enormous membership might hold a referendum, and by that means avoid the necessity of amending the articles of incorporation

Mr. STERLING. I see no practicable objection to the bill as it is, which simply permits the association to amend their by-laws in this particular. I have a letter here from the field secretary of the association, Mr. Hugh S. McGill, and if the Senator will permit me, I should like to read a short extract from it. I will not read it all.

The only purpose of the bill—

Says Mr. McGill—

is to make possible the reorganization of the association as a representative body instead of a pure democracy, as it is to-day. Under the provision of the charter the officers are elected and the business transacted by the active members present at the annual meeting of the association. It is evident that since the association now has more than 40,000 active members it is impossible for all the members to meet for the transaction of business, and so the association is unanimous in seeking this amendment to its charter, which will make it possible for the association, by amendment to its by-laws, in the regular way to provide a representative form of government made up of delegates from all the States.

That is the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Let the bill be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Assistant Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Education Association of the United States," approved June 30, 1906, be amended by adding an additional section to said act, which section shall be designated section 12 and shall read as follows:

"SEC. 12. That said corporation may provide, by amendments to its by-laws, that the powers of the active members exercised at the annual meeting in the election of officers and the transaction of business shall be vested in and exercised by a representative assembly composed of delegates apportioned, elected, and governed in accordance with the provisions of the by-laws adopted by said corporation."

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I do not rise to object to this particular amendment of the act, although I was not present at the meeting of the committee at which the measure was considered, and so perhaps am not entirely familiar with the circumstances necessitating it. It appears to be an amendment authorizing the corporation to amend its own by-laws. I had supposed that any corporation which had a right to make by-laws had a right themselves to amend them within the limits of the charter; but, as I said, not being familiar with the terms and limitations of this particular act of incorporation, I do not rise to object.

I do, however, wish to take this occasion to say that there is a body of opinion in the Judiciary Committee of the Senate—I can not say accurately how many members take the position—who doubt the authority of the Federal Government to pass acts of incorporation incorporating bodies as national corporations except for some governmental purpose. There is a statute existing which provides that men may associate themselves together in a corporate capacity for certain purposes specified in the statute along the line of education, philanthropy, and purposes of that kind, by being incorporated as corporations of the District of Columbia, and under that statute corporations so incorporated or a corporation incorporated by an act of Congress as a corporation of the District of Columbia has all the powers in the transaction of business within the scope of the powers given to it by its charter that any corporation has.

There seems to be an opinion among people who are engaged in a common purpose, and who are quite numerous and located all over the country, that in some way it adds to their potency or dignity or standing nationally or internationally to be incorporated as a national corporation by a special act of Congress.

I am moved to make this statement by the fact that this is the era of organizations, and it would seem that almost every purpose is sought to be accomplished by a numerous body of people desiring to be incorporated as a corporation of the United States of America, and the committee is being besieged by applications from all sorts of organizations for special acts of Congress for national incorporation.

The International Association of Rotarian Clubs is memorializing Congress and the members of the committee to incorporate them by special act of Congress as a national corporation. The purposes and activities and ideals of that organization are first-class and very commendable. Their objects are self-improvement and the education of their members along lines touching the great questions of the day as they arise, in a somewhat similar way to the activities which are evidenced by the work of the United States Chamber of Commerce, for instance, though perhaps in a less formal way.

Some policy must be adopted. If the National Education Association is worthy of a special act of Congress incorporating it as a national corporation, as the precedents show that we thought were the Carnegie Foundation and the National Academy of Sciences or Research Foundation, or whatever it was, and so forth, other organizations do not see any reason why they should be discriminated against, because if we had the power to incorporate the institutions referred to, by the same token we have the power to incorporate anything. Every society in this country—Masons, Odd Fellows, Knights of Columbus, and other organizations, very proper and meritorious—want the same privilege, and I can not blame them if they do.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, as the Senator from Connecticut is a great lawyer, I hope he will yield to me, as I should like to ask him a question. I desire to ask whether, in his opinion, we have any power under the Constitution to incorporate such an association? I know we have done so in a few instances, and in a few other instances we have refused to do so on the ground that we had no power to take such action. If we once open the door to granting such incorporations, where is it going to lead us?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from North Carolina understands the object of this bill. It is proposed to amend the articles of incorporation of a society which we have already incorporated.

Mr. OVERMAN. I am glad to be advised to that effect by the Senator from Colorado; but the Senator from Connecticut is speaking so learnedly on this subject that I desire to ask his opinion about it. I have a high regard for the opinion of the Senator from Connecticut; I myself know what his opinion is; but I should like to have the country know it. He is discussing a very important subject, and his opinion about this matter should go in the RECORD. I should like to ask the Senator from Connecticut whether, in his opinion, we have any power to grant charters to private organizations and societies? There is hardly a meeting of the Judiciary Committee when some request is not presented for a charter or for articles of incorporation. I should like to know where it is going to lead. If we have the power to incorporate one, we have the power to incorporate, and perhaps ought to incorporate, all. It seems from what the Senator from Colorado said that the society in this particular instance has already been incorporated, and inasmuch as that is the case, whether or not we should amend the articles of incorporation is another question.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I must say that I have not given the matter that degree of consideration that would warrant me in expressing a final opinion about it; but I assume, this being a Government of specially delegated powers, and possessing only the powers granted to it under the Constitution and such powers as are necessary to be assumed from those specifically granted, unless the object of the incorporation can be shown to be necessary because of the exercise of some governmental power by the United States, that Congress has no authority to incorporate such a private organization or association. However, as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. OVERMAN] has stated, we have done so in several instances. The instances in which that power has been assumed by Congress, at least those in which it has recently been assumed, were instances which would entirely warrant the exercise of that power, if anything could warrant it other than a governmental exercise of power. They were certainly most commendable and country wide in their objects; they were charitable enterprises and tremendously useful to civilization; but they depend for the legitimacy of their incorporation upon exactly the same principle upon which a society merely for the improvement of its members in social conversation would depend.

As I have said, I have not objected to the consideration of amendments to acts of incorporation heretofore granted; and as this is such a case, I shall not object; but I wanted to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we let it be known that it is the policy of the Judiciary Committee and of the Senate to continue to incorporate, as national corporations, societies and organizations which are merely for the improvement of the intellects and morals of their own members or for social intercourse, or for things of that kind, we shall have to incorporate every such organization in the United States of America, because it does not cost them anything to get an act of incorporation, and no such organization will be content to remain in what they will regard as an inferior position, that is, carrying on their activities under a State charter instead of a national charter.

They seem to think that if they get a special act of Congress incorporating them as a corporation of the United States of America in some way they have the protection of the Federal Government, and they think they would not have that if they were merely incorporated by the State. What intellectual processes they go through to arrive at that conclusion I do not know, because they are all equally to be protected by the powers of the Federal and the State Governments. They own property and they are citizens of the United States, and as such are entitled to all the protection that we can afford.

However, this thing must stop or it must proceed indefinitely. If it is to proceed indefinitely, the first duty of Congress, if it has the power, is to pass a general act of incorporation so that such institutions, if they are entitled to national incorporation, may obtain it as a matter of form upon complying with the conditions recited in the statute, just as most States have general incorporation acts. However, to have this body, that is supposed to be looking after the affairs of this country and its foreign relations and all the reconstruction questions that are pressing upon us in this crisis, wasting its time incorporating various kinds of concerns all over the country seems to me to be undignified and to be an imposition upon the Congress of the United States. That is all I care to say with reference to the matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no amendment, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I approve of the observations just made by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE]. As a member of the Judiciary Committee, I have consistently opposed the granting of charters to private enterprises. I do not believe it is within the power of the Federal Government to grant charters for private concerns, for private enterprises.

The Federal Government may organize corporations for national purposes to aid in the fiscal affairs of the Nation. Congress may authorize the formation of corporations, but it is not within the power or authority of Congress to grant charters for private business, for charities, or business organizations.

Senators will recall that a number of years ago a charter was granted to the National German-American Alliance, but that organization became a menace to the country and after investigation we passed an act disincorporating it. A subcommittee has been appointed in the Committee on the Judiciary to consider the question of a broad general incorporation act for the District of Columbia. I believe it will improve the existing District of Columbia incorporation act and provide for the incorporation within the District of incorporations for all legitimate and proper purposes. In my opinion a provision should be inserted in the bill being proposed requiring all private organizations and corporations holding Federal charters to come in under the District of Columbia incorporation act or have their charters revoked. In my opinion Congress should refuse to grant any further private charters. The incorporation acts of the various States are liberal in their provisions and there is no reason why appeals should be made to Congress for a charter to engage as a corporation in matters not strictly of a governmental nature.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

DESERT LAND SALES.

Mr. PITTMAN. From the Committee on Public Lands I report back favorably, without amendment, the bill (S. 2977) to amend section 8 of an act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories, approved March 3, 1877, as amended by an act to repeal timber culture laws, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1891, and I submit a report (No. 555) thereon.

I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That section 8 of an act to provide for the sale of desert lands in certain States and Territories, approved March 3, 1877, as amended by an act to repeal timber culture laws, and for other purposes, approved March 3, 1891, be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to read as follows:

"SEC. 8. That the provisions of the act to which this is an amendment, and the amendments thereto, shall apply to and be in force in the State of Colorado, as well as the States named in the original act; and, excepting in the State of Nevada, no person shall be entitled to make entry of desert lands unless he be a resident citizen of the State or Territory in which the land sought to be entered is located."

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

FORT DOUGLAS MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. WADSWORTH. From the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 301) to authorize the Secretary of War to grant revocable licenses for the removal of sand and gravel from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation for industrial purposes.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that a Senate bill similar to the joint resolution just reported by him has heretofore passed the Senate.

Mr. WADSWORTH. The resolution reported by me is a House joint resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. Then it has passed the House?

Mr. WADSWORTH. Yes. In view of the observation of the Senator from Utah, I ask unanimous consent that the House joint resolution be considered now. It merely grants licenses to use sand and gravel from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation in accordance with regulations to be fixed by the Secretary of War; and, as has been stated, a similar measure has already passed the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the immediate consideration of the joint resolution?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole, and it was read, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to grant revocable licenses for the removal of sand and gravel from the Fort Douglas Military Reservation, Utah, to persons and corporations within said State, to be used for industrial and manufacturing purposes, at such reasonable prices as may be fixed by the Secretary of War.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LANDING OF THE PILGRIMS.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask to have a change of reference of the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 302) authorizing an appropriation for the participation of the United States in the observance of the three hundredth anniversary of the landing of the Pilgrims at Provincetown and Plymouth, Mass. This does not make an appropriation; it simply authorizes one. It was reported from the Committee on the Library in the House and ought to go to the Senate Committee on the Library, as those committees have charge of such matters.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. WARREN. I think it ought to go to the Committee on the Library for an authorization, and then it will be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The only reason why the Chair sent it to the Committee on Appropriations was that if it is authorized, an appropriation will have to be made.

Mr. LODGE. It will have to go to that committee eventually.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the change of reference will be made.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. SHEPPARD:

A bill (S. 4296) to confer upon the territorial courts of the Territory of Hawaii jurisdiction concurrent with the United States courts of that district of all offenses created by the act of October 28, 1919, known as the national prohibition enforcement act; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

By Mr. CAPPER:

A bill (S. 4297) granting a pension to Lydia Roach (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CURTIS:

A bill (S. 4298) granting a pension to John Thomas Snodgrass (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 4299) granting a pension to Alice M. Petrie (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CALDER:

A bill (S. 4300) for the relief of P. Delany & Co.; to the Committee on Claims.

BONUS FOR EX-SERVICE MEN.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, on Thursday next, after the close of the morning business, I shall, with the consent of the Senate, address myself to the taxpayers of the country in regard to their interest in the proposed bonus legislation for ex-service men.

BOLSHEVISM IN THE UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that to-morrow, at the conclusion of the morning business, if I may be permitted, I shall submit some remarks to the Senate on the subject of Bolshevism in this country and Russia.

NATIONAL BUDGET SYSTEM.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, I wish to give notice that at the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Montana [Mr. MYERS] to-morrow I shall ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill to provide for a national budget system.

RELIEF OF CERTAIN ARMY OFFICERS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. 2448) for relief of certain officers of the United States Army, and for other purposes.

Mr. WADSWORTH. I move that the Senate disagree to the amendments of the House, request a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN, Mr. CAPPER and Mr. MYERS conferees on the part of the Senate.

HOUSE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

H. J. Res. 336. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to loan to the Albert Sidney Johnston Camp, United Confederate Veterans, No. 1820, Fort Worth, Tex., 100 cots and blankets for the use of Confederate veterans at the reunion of said camp June 24 to 27, inclusive, 1920, was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CALLING OF THE ROLL.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ball	Hale	McNary	Shields
Brandegee	Henderson	Myers	Smith, Md.
Calder	Jones, Wash.	Nelson	Smoot
Capper	Kellogg	New	Sterling
Chamberlain	Keyes	Nugent	Swanson
Culberson	King	Overman	Thomas
Curtis	Knox	Owen	Trammell
Dial	Lodge	Page	Underwood
Dillingham	McCormick	Phipps	Wadsworth
Gerry	McCumber	Reed	Warren
Glass	McLean	Sheppard	Watson

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS], and the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. SMITH] are absent on official business.

Mr. McNARY. I wish to announce the absence of the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. GRONNA], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL], and the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] on official business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CURTIS in the chair). Forty-four Senators have answered to their names, not a quorum. The Secretary will call the names of absentees.

The Reading Clerk called the names of the absent Senators, and Mr. HITCHCOCK, Mr. JONES of New Mexico, and Mr. McKELLAR answered to their names when called.

Mr. GAY, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. COMER, Mr. SIMMONS, Mr. RANSDELL, Mr. PHELAN, and Mr. FRANCE entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Fifty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The morning business is closed.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the urgent deficiency appropriation bill, H. R. 13677.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13677) making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations, with amendments.

Mr. WARREN. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that the bill be read in full for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

SHORTAGE OF SUGAR.

Mr. OWEN. Mr. President, I have here a letter from a wholesale house in Oklahoma with regard to the speculation in sugar which I think is of particular interest, and I should like to have it printed in the RECORD.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. OWEN. I will read the letter.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes; that is all right.

Mr. OWEN. It is as follows:

McALESTER, OKLA., April 21, 1920.

Hon. ROBERT L. OWEN, U. S. S.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. OWEN: The increasing cost of sugar is much in the public mind at this time. Speculators are to-day quoting and selling sugar at more than 10 cents a pound over the average cane sugar refiners' price. True, the sugar refiners are selling their refined based on the cost of their raws, at least we presume they are, but the speculator ignores all this and even considering that raw sugar is at the highest price it has reached in more than 50 years, allowing double the profit fixed by the Government during the war period for sacking and refining, etc., refined granulated should not be selling at more than 23 cents by anyone. But Mr. Speculator cares nothing for that and he is asking from 28 cents to 30 cents, and is getting it in many cases, and of course in the long run the consumers of the country pay the penalty.

Sugar, in one form or another, we are told, comprises about 13 per cent of the foods consumed by the people of the United States. Therefore, the price of sugar very vitally affects every man, woman, and child in the United States, and we believe Congress should do something to curb this speculation, which is now running riot.

The writer does not pretend to be an expert or to be competent to advise you just what action should be taken by the Congress of the United States or the Executive department of the United States, but surely something should be done, and it just occurs to us that first legislation might be enacted prohibiting the buying and selling of sugars except by recognized dealers, and also prohibiting the sale of sugars by citizens of the United States to any person, firm, corporation, or Government outside of the United States except possibly under certain regulations. We are advised that dealers in lines in no way related to the production or distribution of foods are buying and selling sugars, and oftentimes a single car is sold a number of times before it is finally distributed by the wholesaler to the retailer and by the retailer to the consumer.

We believe even the introduction of some kind of a bill curbing speculation in sugar would result in breaking the present bull market, which, if uninterrupted, bids fair to be still higher and work further hardships and burdens on the people of the United States. True, there is a world-wide sugar shortage, but at that the speculator should not be permitted to get away with a profit of 5 cents or 6 cents a pound, and in some instances much more, at the expense of the general public.

We understand the British Government has at times, and possibly has at this time, imposed restrictions on dealers in sugar, although we are not familiar with the nature of these restrictions.

Fixing the margin of profits to be made by wholesale grocers and retail grocers will do little to correct the present situation, since if the speculators are allowed to continue their present policy they will continue to boost the price of both raws and refined, and the legitimate dealer in sugar will not be able to anything like supply his needs unless he does buy from sugar speculators, and will therefore be obliged to base his selling price largely on the price he is compelled to pay the speculator.

We should be pleased to have your views on this all-important subject, and also your advice as to whether or not you think anything can be, or will be, done in the matter.

Very respectfully,

GRIFFIN GROCERY CO.,
J. T. GRIFFIN.

I call attention to the fact that outside speculators are deliberately buying up sugar and hoarding it, according to the statements made in this letter.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. Pesident, will the Senator yield?

Mr. OWEN. I yield.

Mr. SMOOT. If I were the Senator, I would write to his constituent and tell him that there is a law on the statute books now to prosecute just such offenses; and, if he will report any case to the Attorney General, I have no doubt but that the Attorney General will make an investigation of it, or at least I should think he would. I see no reason why he should not, because the law is plain enough, and it is now in force.

Mr. OWEN. The reason for putting this letter in the RECORD is to give publicity to this abuse, and to call the attention of the Federal Trade Commission to it, which I intend to do, as a matter of record in the Senate. I want it to be informed that the Senate has had this matter before it.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, I have had a great many complaints from Virginia that grocers and dealers in sugar have not been able to get the quantity of sugar that they ought to. They have the idea that the refineries have entered into a contract to sell their output to speculators.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator if they do, it would be the very worst piece of business they ever undertook, and it would virtually disrupt their regular line of trade. I can not see why they should do it, because they are selling within the limits of profits allowed them, I understand, under an agreement with the Department of Justice, and they could not sell at any higher rate to a speculator than to a wholesale grocer.

Mr. OWEN. This wholesale grocer says there are outside profiteers coming in and buying this product from the refiners, and then holding it, and because the ordinary trade can not get it from any other source, the refiners having sold their supply to the speculators, who hoard it, the wholesale grocers have to buy from these speculators, and they are acting as arbitrary, intervening middlemen, not in the ordinary business but jumping in for the purpose of extorting a profit from the sale of sugar in this country.

Mr. SMOOT. I think every case like that ought to be reported to the Attorney General, and it ought to be handled under the law.

Mr. SWANSON. I have received complaints from merchants in Virginia to the effect that they have given orders to the refiners for sugar and the refiners would notify them that the entire output had been disposed of and that it was impossible for their orders to be filled. If it is true that the sugar refiners of the country will not supply the regular distributing channels, but sell their output to speculators who hoard it and will not let the people have it now until it gets to an exorbitant price, something ought to be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I do not believe the report. The refiners are certainly business men, and they are going to take care of their regular line of customers. If they do not do it, I do not know what would happen to their business in the future. I have no doubt but that there are speculators in sugar who sell the sugar at an increased price. There is a shortage of sugar. I noticed in a London press report the other day that England has 50,000 tons of sugar lying at the wharf at Liverpool with no place to unload it.

Of course, there is a clamor for sugar all over the United States. The Government of the United States should have purchased the Cuban crop. But that was not done. It could have been done, and it ought to have been done when the purchase could have been made at 5⅛ cents per pound.

Mr. SWANSON. It certainly is a serious situation. If, when fruit, vegetables, and everything of that kind are in the hands of farmers for canning, if this scarcity of sugar continues into the summer months, it will be impossible to have any successful canning on the part of the farmers.

Mr. SMOOT. It is a very serious situation.

Mr. SWANSON. It seems to me that Congress or some department of the Government should take vigorous action to see that great industries like those which conserve food and take care of food which would otherwise waste should be supplied with sugar to take care of that situation.

Mr. SMOOT. If the speculators are held down to the price the sugar is purchased for in Cuba plus the expense of refining it in the United States and the selling of it at a reasonable profit, they are not going to get into the market. If the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] will simply tell his constituent to report the name of this speculator, or this profiteer, to the Attorney General, I have not any doubt but that the Attorney General will take steps to prosecute the man, and he ought to be prosecuted.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the situation in connection with the beet-sugar industry?

Mr. SMOOT. The East has drawn upon the beet-sugar crop to such an extent that to-day I doubt whether there is enough beet sugar left at the beet-sugar factories to carry them over until the next season.

Mr. SWANSON. What course has the beet-sugar industry pursued in connection with the price and distribution?

Mr. SMOOT. I think every price that has been made by the sugar-beet producers has been immediately reported to the Attorney General. The beet-sugar producers sold sugar at 10½ cents until nearly 53 per cent of their crop was disposed of. Then it was raised to 12 cents, and later to——

Mr. SWANSON. What is the difference between what the price at which the eastern producers sell sugar and what the producers of beet sugar get?

Mr. SMOOT. I think the beet-sugar producers in the West are selling for less than the Cuban producers are receiving for the raw sugar.

Mr. SWANSON. I am asking these questions of the Senator from Utah because he is an expert on the subject of sugar, and he is also a member of the Finance Committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Only the other day a gentleman who had returned from Cuba told me that there never was such a time, and never would be again, as exists to-day in the extravagant expenditure of money in Cuba. Instead of 3 cents a pound for their sugar, they are selling it all the way from 17 and 19 cents, and I heard of the sale of a cargo in Cuba the other day at 19¾ cents a pound; and that is not refined sugar; it is 96 per cent centrifugal sugar.

Mr. SWANSON. I would like to ask the Senator to what extent the tariff duty on sugar interferes with the ability to get sugar in this country?

Mr. SMOOT. None whatever.

Mr. SWANSON. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator from Utah, as the chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate is not here. With this situation in connection with sugar, and the confession on the part of the Senator from Utah that the conditions will get worse and worse during the summer months, and the canning industry of the country, especially among the farmers may be jeopardized, I would suggest that the Finance Committee of the Senate investigate this matter and report to the Senate a means by which these difficulties can be corrected.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, may we not go on with the pending appropriation bill?

Mr. SWANSON. The appropriation bill is very urgent, but there are a million people in the country who have the hardship of a higher price of sugar staring them in the face.

Mr. WARREN. I do not understand that the Senator has placed any proposition before the Senate.

Mr. SWANSON. I have a proposition to make. It is that the Finance Committee of the Senate, or some other committee, investigate and recommend to the Senate some way of getting rid of this difficulty, and I would like to see the Senator from Utah a member of that investigating committee.

Mr. SMOOT. The Finance Committee can not prevent France and England from purchasing sugar. England was farsighted enough, so I have been informed by Cuban planters, to purchase sugar in time, and they have purchased it in quantities never purchased before. Of course, they have their canning season just the same as we have ours.

Mr. SWANSON. Does the Finance Committee contemplate any investigation of the subject whatever?

Mr. SMOOT. There was no thought of it.

Mr. SWANSON. It has had no purpose of ascertaining the cause of it, and providing a remedy?

Mr. SMOOT. There is an investigation going on at the present time in relation to the charges made that the refiners were charging too much for sugar. That is the only investigation I know of.

Mr. SWANSON. What is the present tariff on refined sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. About a cent a pound from Cuba.

Mr. SWANSON. What is it from the rest of the world?

Mr. SMOOT. From what countries?

Mr. SWANSON. Say, from Java, if any should come in.

Mr. SMOOT. That sugar does not come into the United States.

Mr. SWANSON. I know we have a reciprocity treaty with Cuba; but what is the duty on sugar?

Mr. SMOOT. It would be 20 per cent more; a dollar and twenty-five cents in round figures.

URGENT DEFICIENCY APPROPRIATIONS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13677), making appropriations to supply a deficiency in the appropriations for the Federal control of transportation systems and to supply urgent deficiencies in certain appropriations for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. STERLING in the chair). The Secretary will proceed to read the bill.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill, and read to line 4, page 3, the last paragraph read being as follows:

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in certifying to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount payable to any carrier under paragraphs (f) and (g) of section 204 of the transportation act, 1920, also shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury such sums, if any, as may be due from such carrier to the President (as operator of transportation systems under Federal control) on account of traffic balances or other indebtedness. The amount so certified to be due the President, upon his request, shall be deducted by the Secretary of the Treasury from the amount so certified to be due such carrier and thereupon shall be credited by him to the appropriation made in section 202 of the transportation act, 1920. Such deductions shall be considered as a payment pro tanto of such indebtedness to the Government.

Mr. WARREN. I have a committee amendment to offer to come in at line 24, page 2.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. On page 2, line 24, after the word "amount," insert "of the deficit or decrease in its railway operating income," so as to make the clause read:

The amount so certified to be due the President, upon his request, shall be deducted by the Secretary of the Treasury from the amount of the deficit or decrease in its railway operating income so certified to be due such carrier.

And so forth.

Mr. KING. May I have the attention of the chairman of the committee? Is the $300,000,000 carried in the bill in addition to the very large amount heretofore appropriated?

Mr. WARREN. It is. We have appropriated five hundred million and seven hundred and fifty million, and this is in addition to that.

Mr. KING. Then we have heretofore appropriated $1,250,000,000 for the railroads?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. KING. That is, to meet the cost of governmental operation for a few months. Then, in addition, this bill carries $300,000,000. It would then amount to about $1,801,000,000.

Mr. WARREN. The Senator will remember that five hundred million was appropriated, and then seven hundred and fifty million, and this estimate is for four hundred and twenty-one million and something. Those amounts added together are intended to cover entirely the cost of the Government in running the roads, and all that it will take, except in the matter of loans, to put the railroads back into running order. But the railroad act also carried an additional appropriation of $200,000,000, and I believe another one—I do not remember whether a hundred or one hundred and fifty million, but those are in the nature of loans. It is possible that of this $300,000,000 some may be returned. Probably there will be, say, thirty million more in the differences of undermaintenance and overmaintenance, which we will have to settle. That is, the Government will have to pay the roads in some cases, and the railroads will have to pay the Government in others.

Mr. KING. I should like to inquire of the Senator whether, with this $300,000,000, the amount appropriated, will cover all of the appropriations to be made by the Federal Government to the railroads because of the Government having taken them over during the war?

Mr. WARREN. Perhaps the Senator did not notice the next paragraph. It is not an expenditure in one sense, but it takes money in another. The War Finance Corporation must pay at par for the ninety millions of Liberty bonds which are in the Treasury, and that makes $390,000,000, and we leave the difference between that and the $420,000,000, expecting or hoping that the thirty millions may be made up in the adjustment of the balances which I have mentioned, of undermaintenance and overmaintenance. This is intended to be all that we shall be called upon to appropriate.

Mr. KING. Have the railroad representatives reported that this will wipe out the indebtedness of the Government?

Mr. WARREN. Not the railroads as such, but the Director General of Railroads, who is supreme in these matters, Mr. Hines, and his attorney, an ex-Member of the House, Mr. Sherley, say that they can probably go through with this amount. The $30,000,000 is in the air to some extent, but they expect now that they may be self-sustaining with the loans provided for in the railroad act. In fact, the entire amount it has taken to float this great railroad system while it was in the Government's hands and now to put it back where it is to be on its own feet amounts to over $1,800,000,000.

Mr. KING. In addition to those amounts will there not be many claims presented against the Government?

Mr. WARREN. There are claims both ways. It is believed that they will nearly balance each other.

Mr. KING. My information some months ago was that the claims would be presented against the Government for damages to the systems which the Government had taken charge of approximating some $400,000,000 or $500,000,000, and that it would take years to litigate those claims, and that the Congress would be called upon to make further appropriations, and that probably if we escape those contingent liabilities with the payment of $300,000,000 or $400,000,000 we would be very fortunate. Does the Senator know whether or not that information is accurate?

Mr. WARREN. Undoubtedly a great many claims will be presented which will be disallowed, and a great many more will be cut down very materially. I have much faith not only in Mr. Hines but in Mr. Sherley, who has given his entire time to the matter since leaving Congress, and without any certainty he gives me that assurance. As I said, there may be $30,000,000 yet, but he believes they can get through without it, and wants to try to do so.

Mr. KING. Then the experiment of running the railroads for a few months by the Government will have cost the Federal Government approximately $1,800,000,000 to $2,000,000,000?

Mr. WARREN. Yes.

Mr. SMOOT. There are claims yet, I will say to the Senator, for depreciation of roadbeds and rolling stock that are bound to come.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; I think they will come.

Mr. SMOOT. I was riding over the Pennsylvania Road the other day. Years ago it used to have the very finest roadbed in the United States, but I must say that to-day it is not in first-class condition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Federal control of transportation systems," on page 2, line 25, after the words "shall be," to insert "transferred from the appropriation made in paragraph G of the said section 204 and," so as to make the clause read:

The Interstate Commerce Commission, in certifying to the Secretary of the Treasury the amount payable to any carrier under paragraphs (f) and (g) of section 204 of the transportation act, 1920, also shall certify to the Secretary of the Treasury such sums, if any, as may be due from such carrier to the President (as operator of transportation systems under Federal control) on account of traffic balances or other indebtedness. The amount so certified to be due the President, upon his request, shall be deducted by the Secretary of the Treasury from the amount of the deficit or decrease in its railway operating income so certified to be due such carrier and thereupon shall be transferred from the appropriation made in paragraph G of the said section 204 and credited by him to the appropriation made in section 202 of the transportation act, 1920. Such deductions shall be considered as a payment pro tanto of such indebtedness to the Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6 on page 4, the last paragraphs read being as follows:

IMPROVEMENTS AND REPAIRS.

Repairs to suburban roads: For current work of repairs to suburban roads and suburban streets, including maintenance of motor vehicles, $35,000.

SEWERS.

For operation and maintenance of the sewage pumping service, including repairs to boilers, machinery, and pumping stations, and employment of mechanics, laborers, and two watchmen, purchase of coal, oils, waste, and other supplies, and for maintenance of motor trucks, $15,000.

CHARITIES AND CORRECTIONS.

Hospital for the Insane: For support of indigent insane of the District of Columbia in St. Elizabeths Hospital, as provided by law, $350,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I inquire of the chairman of the committee the occasion for these deficits in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WARREN. These deficits are caused in two or three ways. When the appropriations were first made, the war matters had not been sufficiently settled to give them the help that they wanted to come within the bounds of the prices they could pay; furthermore, as to the pavement and roads, the Army trucks and heavy business, not only Army trucks but the coal trucks and others, have been very disastrous in their effect upon the roads, and failing, as they did, to keep them up through the war season it requires now a large amount. Then to this must be added increased cost of material and labor. These deficiencies have been caused unavoidably, as it seems.

Mr. KING. My recollection was that when the appropriation bill for the District was under consideration a year ago, Congress was very liberal and anticipated these points. If the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] will pardon me just a moment, I was going to direct attention to the $350,000 item which follows for the Hospital for the Insane. My recollection is that we were very liberal in making appropriation for that hospital, and I can not understand why there should be a deficit of $350,000 with respect to that item.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, we were very liberal in the Senate, but all of our liberality did not stay in when the bill went to conference. I have looked over these deficiencies very carefully and I think all of them are justified. We tried to make pretty liberal provision, but we were in conference, the Senator will remember, many weeks, and we did not get all that was put in by the Senate. As to some of the hospitals for which we appropriated, the money has not been used. The roads were not all provided for. I think the deficiencies here are justifiable.

Mr. KING. It seems to me a deficiency of $350,000 for one hospital must be the result of some error.

Mr. CURTIS. For St. Elizabeths?

Mr. KING. St. Elizabeths.

Mr. CURTIS. That is brought about by the great increase in its charges. I have not the figures before me, but the increase in the number of inmates and in the cost of maintenance has been very great. I will not attempt to state it offhand, but the number was nearly doubled.

Mr. WARREN. The insane asylum has had to take care of a very great many returned soldiers temporarily, if not longer. Of course, there has been a great increase in the cost of maintenance, and so forth, but the numbers have so greatly increased that even this sum appropriated is a cut down from what really ought to be given that hospital. It seems to those who have greatly interested themselves in the poor insane that despite the fact that we have a most excellent man at the head of it, Dr. White, and a good corps of assistants, neglect has been found existing at various times, simply as a result of too little help to take care of those poor unfortunates.

Mr. CURTIS. May I call the attention of the Senator from Utah to the fact that the annual cost of patients increased from $299.20 to $532.90.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 22, page 4, the last paragraph read being as follows:

INTERSTATE COMMERCE COMMISSION.

For two additional members of the commission, at the rate of $12,000 per annum each, from April 16 to June 30, 1920, inclusive; and for the amount required to increase the compensation of nine members of the commission from $10,000 to $12,000 per annum each and the secretary of the commission from $5,000 to $7,500 per annum from February 28 to June 30, 1920, inclusive, $12,004.23.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, it seems to me there ought to be some amendment to the provision just read, found on page 4; otherwise it would be construed as a direct appropriation for additional members of the Interstate Commerce Commission of April 16, though they may not be appointed for some time yet.

Mr. WARREN. They will be paid only from the time they are appointed and take the oath of office. This was put in to cover the time, whether they are or are not appointed. I do not believe that they will get a penny more than their time of service calls for.

Mr. KING. I presume they will not, and yet this authorizes, indeed it directs, payment from April 16, notwithstanding they may not be appointed for several weeks or perhaps a month or so thereafter.

Mr. WARREN. That date is because of the legislation that provided for it. It is carrying out the law.

Mr. KING. It would be wise if there was a provision inserted, "Provided, That this appropriation shall be available only from the date of appointment."

Mr. WARREN. There is already such a law in existence.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 4, page 6.

Mr. WARREN. I have an amendment to insert at this point, which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. Under the head "Miscellaneous," on page 6, after line 4, insert:

The Auditor of the Navy Department is authorized and directed to pay to the San Francisco Dredge Co., contractor for the dry dock at Pearl Harbor, the sum of $128,260.60, heretofore appropriated in the act approved March 6, 1920, upon Treasury estimates set forth in Senate Document numbered 210, Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, payment to be made as a liquidated settlement when said contractor executes and delivers a release of all claims and demands whatsoever connected with said contract and work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wyoming.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the committee why it is necessary to reenact this provision? If the former bill adequately covered the item, why should we deal with it again?

Mr. WARREN. The former bill did not perhaps adequately cover it. The amount was appropriated, but the Auditor of the Navy Department is properly very particular and notices in that appropriation that it did not contain what this contains, a provision compelling the people receiving the payment to receipt in full in liquidation of all damages. This is a limitation really upon the appropriation which we have already made and will relieve the situation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed, as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

For medical, surgical, and hospital services and supplies for war-risk insurance patients and other beneficiaries of the Public Health Service, including necessary personnel, regular and reserve commissioned officers of the Public Health Service, clerical help in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, maintenance, equipment, leases, fuel, lights, water, printing, freight, transportation and travel, maintenance and operation of passenger motor vehicles, and reasonable burial expenses (not exceeding $100 for any patient dying in hospital), $7,666,187.14.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee whether there are any restrictions or limitations upon the number of employees, doctors, and so-called experts that may be taken into this service, or is there any restriction as to the amount of compensation to be paid to the various employees, or is some one at the head of this organization, or some board connected with it, given full and unrestricted authority to employ whom they please, as many as they please, and pay what they please?

I know some of these executive agencies provided by Congress have no limitations, unfortunately, and waste and extravagance have characterized the administration of some of the organizations.

Mr. WARREN. This particular sum is to take care of the patients from the War Risk Bureau for the remainder of the year, and is, of course, appropriated in accordance with legislation previously enacted. I presume the Senator knows that during the war, as to the erection of some of these institutions, we did not, perhaps, take the pains which we ought to have taken in the matter of restrictions. The subject is now under very serious consideration, as it has been during the entire past winter, and I expect on the sundry civil bill, which is about to follow, that we shall be able very materially to relieve the situation. I know we shall have the approval of the Senator from Utah in attempting to do so. However, this legislation is all right. It provides for the appropriation of money which is necessary to take care of these people. The sum is smaller than the estimate which was made, but I think they will be able to get along with it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I desire to say I think that there should be an investigation of the Public Health Service made by a joint committee of the Committee on Appropriations and the Committee on Military Affairs, not so much with a view of criticizing that service, for it has done admirable work, but with a view of developing and agreeing upon some plan of dealing with the great field upon which that service is now entering.

I have had a number of conferences with persons who have been connected with that organization, and from statements made by them and statements which have appeared in the press, doubtless emanating from some persons in the Public Health Service, it is apparent that demands are going to be made upon the Government aggregating millions, and exceeding, indeed, $100,000,000, for the Public Health Service within a very short time.

In view of such a great program, and in view of the great work which will be devolved and is being devolved upon this organization, it seems to me that there ought to be a well-matured plan agreed upon; that we ought to determine the number of hospitals that will be constructed; where they shall be constructed; whether the hospitals that were built by the War Department during the war may not be utilized or in part availed of for these purposes; and, generally, to agree upon a plan that will be rational, just, and fair, and that will conduce to the public welfare and also to economy.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I appreciate the value of the suggestions of the Senator from Utah, but let me say to him that the work to which he refers is now going on vigorously. The House Appropriations Committee has taken the matter up and is still sifting it. The Committee on Appropriations on this side had a meeting, and adjourned only a few moments before we came into the Chamber this morning, to consider this very subject. We had with us also the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I think the Senator from Utah will find that we shall make a very good start in reference to the matter before the sundry civil bill shall have been finally finished in this body.

The reading of the bill was resumed and continued to the end of line 15, on page 7, the last paragraph read being as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR.

UNITED STATES HOUSING CORPORATION.

Washington, D. C., Government hotel for Government workers: For maintenance, operation, and management of the hotel and restaurant therein, including personal services, $275,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I desire to make an inquiry with reference to the item which has just been read, which relates to the Government hotel in Washington.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Utah that the money involved in that item has already been collected. The Senator will remember that a few months ago we provided that every penny taken in by all these places should go into the United States Treasury, and that we should, from time to time, appropriate such sums as were necessary to provide for their maintenance. In accordance with that action, the money here involved has already been collected, and this appropriation is being made to cover the expenses of the undertaking.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator from Wyoming know whether or not steps are being taken to wind up the affairs of that organization?

Mr. WARREN. Such steps have been taken. Of course, the Senator from Utah knows that the so-called Government Hotel has been taken out of the hands of the corporation that previously handled it, and it is now under the Treasury Department. When we get into the next fiscal year the appropriations for help for the various institutions carried in the legislative appropriation bill having been cut down, departments will be compelled to restrict their activities somewhat; and so we hope that this hotel institution will in time fade away as something no longer needed.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Legislative," on page 7, after line 16, to insert:

SENATE.

To pay Tallulah J. Bankhead, widow of Hon. John H. Bankhead, late a Senator from the State of Alabama, $7,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, after line 20, to insert:

For repairs, improvements, equipment, and supplies for Senate kitchens and restaurants, Capitol Building and Senate Office Buildings, including personal and other services, to be expended by the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds, under the supervision of the Committee on Rules, United States Senate, $16,990.95.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations was present several days ago when I called attention to an item of $219,916.02, which was reported to Congress under the provisions of section 10 of the river and harbor act of 1919. That amount really constitutes a deficiency, and ought to be paid. The Senator at that time suggested that the proper place for it would be on a deficiency bill.

Mr. WARREN. Yes; but the bill now under consideration had at that time already been reported from the committee. There is, however, a general deficiency bill which will come up for consideration in 30 or 40 days or so, and if the Senator will take the pains to get the item in the form of an estimate I shall be glad to assist him in any way I can, and shall endeavor to provide for it. We can not, however, well add the item to this bill, because there is no estimate for it as yet, and the pending measure is really an urgent deficiency bill.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am not going to insist on the item going into the pending bill, but I wanted the Senator to know that I shall ask that it go on the general deficiency bill, and I am calling attention to it now so that the Senator will not forget it.

Mr. WARREN. I remember the Senator's remarks the other day, and I remember that I assured the Senator that if he could get the item in form so that we could carry it on one of the subsequent appropriation bills we would try to do so.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. The estimate has come from the Secretary of War to the Speaker of the House in formal shape, and I will see to it that a copy is furnished the committee.

Mr. WARREN. I suggest that the Senator have it come from the Treasury Department, which will make it more formal.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask that that be done.

Mr. SMOOT. Let me suggest to the Senator that he had better have the Committee on Appropriations of the House put it in the general deficiency bill over there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I can not look after the committee of the House. I might try to do that, but in any event I shall certainly make the effort here in the Senate.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator can request the Representatives from his State in the House to look after the matter and induce them to have it put on over there.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not know as to that.

Mr. WARREN. Of course, it would more certainly insure action upon the matter if it were put on in the House than if it were put on in the first instance in the Senate. If it were put on there, there would be very little chance of its being lost, whereas if we put it on here and any opposition should develop there might be some trouble in conference. I advise the Senator, along the line of the suggestion of my colleague on the committee, to see if he can have it placed on the bill in the other House, but the fact that they do not put it on there need not necessarily prevent us from putting it on in the Senate.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Then the committee would not feel precluded from the consideration of the matter if there were no action taken on the other side?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. That is all I ask.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13266, being the District of Columbia appropriation bill.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13266) making appropriations to provide for the expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes; which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Kansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The reading clerk proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 1, after the enacting clause, to strike out:

That the following sums are appropriated out of the revenues of the District of Columbia to the extent that they are sufficient therefor and the remainder out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, but the amount to be paid from the Treasury of the United States shall in no event be as much as one-half of said expenses, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, except the amounts to pay the interest and sinking fund on the funded debt of said District, of which amounts one half is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, namely:

The rate of taxation on real estate in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 5 of the District of Columbia appropriation act approved July 1, 1902, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent, and the rate of taxation on tangible personal property in the District of Columbia, under the provisions of section 6 of the said act, is hereby increased from 1½ per cent to 2½ per cent.

And insert:

That one half of the following sums, respectively, is appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and the other half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia, in full for the following expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, namely:

Hereafter the estimates of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia for any fiscal year, submitted in accordance with the act of June 11, 1878, shall state the necessary expenses of the government of the District of Columbia for said year, and shall bear no arbitrary relation to the total estimated revenues of the District of Columbia for such fiscal year, and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized and directed to advance, on the requisition of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, made in the manner now prescribed by law, out of any moneys in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary from time to time to meet the general expenses of said District, as authorized by Congress, and to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advances payable by the District of Columbia out of the taxes and revenues collected for the support of the government thereof. If in any year the taxes and revenues of the District of Columbia shall be insufficient to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advance payable by the District of Columbia, such unpaid advance shall be reimbursed to said Treasury out of the revenues of the District of Columbia of the succeeding year or years. If in any year the taxes and revenues of the District of Columbia shall be more than sufficient to reimburse the Treasury for the portion of said advances payable by the District of Columbia, such surplus of revenue and all unexpended surpluses of District revenue shown by the reports of said commissioners to have been heretofore accumulated and deposited in the Treasury of the United States shall be held in the Treasury as a trust fund for the benefit of said District and be available as revenue of the District of Columbia for meeting the portion of appropriations payable by said District in the succeeding year or years, and all acts and parts of acts in conflict with any of the provisions herein contained are hereby repealed.

Hereafter the 50 per cent of approved estimates to be levied and assessed under the act of June 11, 1878, upon the taxable property and privileges in said District shall be raised by the imposition of such rate of taxation on realty and tangible and intangible personal property as the commissioners shall ascertain to be necessary to raise annually, in combination with other District tax revenues and unexpended tax surpluses of previous years, a sum sufficient to meet the proportion of expenses to be paid by the District of Columbia under said act of June 11, 1878: Provided, That the present tax rate shall continue in force until on formal report of the commissioners, as above provided, it shall be changed.

Mr. CURTIS. On behalf of the committee, I move to perfect the amendment by omitting the last proviso. It was left in by mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out the proviso, beginning on line 14, page 4, after the numerals "1878."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "General expenses," on page 5, line 7, after "$1,800," to insert "one $1,600," so as to make the clause read:

Purchasing division: Purchasing officer, $3,000; deputy purchasing officer, $1,800; computer, $1,440; clerks—1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 3 at $1,500 each, 12 at $1,200 each (5 of whom shall be stenographers and typewriters), 1 $1,100, 3 at $1,000 each; storekeeper, $1,200; messenger, $600; driver, $600; inspectors—1 of materials $1,400, 2 at $900 each; 2 property-yard keepers, at $1,000 each; temporary labor, $250.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 15, before the word "each," to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,360," so as to make the clause read:

Building inspection division: Inspector of buildings, $3,000; assistant inspectors of buildings—principal $2,000, 1 $1,500, 1 $1,400, 9 at $1,360 each; fire-escape inspector, $1,400; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors for such time as their services may be necessary, $1,000; civil engineers or computers—1 $2,000, 1 $1,800, 1 $1,500; clerks—chief $1,800, 1 $1,050, 1 $1,000, 1 (who shall be a stenographer and typewriter) $1,000, 1 $900; messenger, $600; assistant inspector, $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, line 25, before the word "each," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,360," so as to make the clause read:

Plumbing inspection division: Inspector of plumbing, $2,000; assistant inspectors of plumbing—principal $1,550, 6 at $1,360 each; clerks—2 at $1,200 each, 1 $900; temporary employment of additional assistant inspectors of plumbing and laborers for such time as their services may be necessary, $3,000; draftsmen, $1,350; sewer tapper, $1,000; 3 members of plumbing board, at $150 each.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, line 5, after the word "office," to strike out "$124,670" and insert "$128,670," so as to make the clause read:

In all, executive office, $128,670.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 8, after the word "each," to insert "chief inspector of personal property, $1,800," and, in line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$32,600," so as to make the clause read:

Personal tax board: Three assistant assessors of personal taxes, at $3,000 each; chief inspector of personal property, $1,800; appraiser of personal property, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; assistant clerk, $1,000; 2 inspectors, at $1,200 each; extra clerks hire, $2,000; intangible personal property—2 clerks at $1,500 each, 5 inspectors at $1,200 each, clerk to board of personal tax assessors, $1,800, 2 clerks at $1,200 each; in all, $32,600.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 7, line 18, before the words "at $1,400 each," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; in line 19, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; and in line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$13,100" and insert "$15,700," so as to make the clause read:

License bureau: Superintendent of licenses (who shall also be secretary to the automobile board without additional compensation), $2,000; clerks—3 at $1,400 each, 3 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000, 1 $900; inspector, $1,200; inspector of licenses, $1,200; assistant inspector of licenses, $1,000; messenger, $600; in all, $15,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 8, line 9, after "$1,800," to insert "teachers' retirement section: Clerks—one $1,800, one $1,500," and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$51,576" and insert "$54,876," so as to make the clause read:

Auditor's office: Auditor, $4,000; chief clerk, $2,250; bookkeeper, $1,800; accountant, $1,500; clerks—3 at $1,600 each, 4 at $1,400 each, 1 $1,350, 4 at $1,200 each, 7 at $1,000 each, 1 $936, 2 at $900 each, 2 at $720 each; stenographer and typist, $1,400; messenger, $600; property survey officer, $1,800; teachers' retirement section: Clerks—1 $1,800, 1 $1,500; disbursing officer, $3,000; deputy disbursing officer, $1,600; clerks—2 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each, 1 $900; messenger, $600; in all, $54,876.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 1, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "twelve" and insert "thirteen"; in line 2, before the words "at $900 each," to strike out "ten" and insert "eight"; and, in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$186,630" and insert "$186,030"; so as to make the clause read:

Engineer commissioner's office: Engineer of highways, $3,000; engineer of bridges, $2,500; superintendents—1 of streets $2,000, 1 of suburban roads $2,250; sanitary engineer, $3,300; asphalts and cements—inspector $2,400, assistant inspector $1,500; trees and parkings—superintendent $2,000, assistant superintendent $1,350; assistant engineers—2 at $2,200 each, 4 at $1,800 each, 2 at $1,600 each, 4 at $1,500 each, 2 at $1,350 each, 1 $1,200; transitmen—3 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,050; rodmen—8 at $900 each, 4 at $780 each; chainmen—6 at $720 each, 6 at 650 each; draftsmen—1 $1,500, 2 at $1,200 each, 1 $1,050; general inspector of sewers, $1,300; inspector of sewers, $1,200; bridge inspector, $1,200; inspectors—2 at $1,500 each, 1 $1,400, 5 (including 2 of streets) at $1,200 each, 1 $1,000, 1 $900; foremen—13 at $1,200 each, 4 at $1,050 each, 8 at $900 each; bridge keepers—1 $650, 3 at $600 each; chief clerk, $2,250; permit clerk, $1,500; assistant permit clerk, $1,000; clerks—1 $1,800, 3 at $1,500 each, 1 $1,400, 2 at $1,350 each, 7 at $1,200 each, 2 at $1,000 each, 1 $900, 3 at $840 each, 1 $720, 1 $600; 7 messengers, at $600 each; skilled laborer, $625; laboratory assistant, $1,200; janitor, $720; steam engineers—principal, $2,090, 1 $1,800, 2 at $1,760 each, 3 assistants at $1,460 each; 6 oilers, at $960 each; 6 firemen, at $1,160 each; storekeeper, $900; superintendent of stables, $1,500; blacksmith, $975; 2 watchmen, at $630 each; 2 drivers, at $630 each; in all, $186,030.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 2, after "$3,000" where it occurs the second time, to strike out "2 assistant accountants at $2,000 each; statistical clerk, $1,800," and insert "assistant accountant, $2,000"; and in line 9, after the words "in all," to strike out "$34,640" and insert "$30,840," so as to make the clause read:

Public Utilities Commission: Executive secretary, $4,000; accountant, $3,000; traffic engineer, $3,000; assistant accountant, $2,000; chief clerk, $1,800; inspectors—1 $1,800, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; inspector of gas and meters, $2,000; inspector of electric meters, $1,800; assistant inspectors—1 $1,200, 2 at $900 each; clerks—2 at 1,400 each, 1 $1,200; 2 messengers, at $720 each; in all, $30,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 12, after the word "necessary," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$10,000," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and all other general necessary expenses authorized by law, including the employment of expert services where necessary, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 13, after the word "Commission," to strike out "$40,640" and insert "$40,840," so as to make the clause read:

In all, Public Utilities Commission, $40,840.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 2, after the word "statistician," to strike out "$1,700" and insert "$1,800"; in line 3, after the word "at," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,000"; in line 4, after the word "stenographer," to strike out "$840" and insert "$1,000"; and in line 5, after the words "in all," to strike out "$11,640" and insert "$12,100," so as to make the clause read:

Department of insurance: Superintendent of insurance, $3,500; deputy and examiner, $2,000; statistician, $1,800; clerks—1 $1,200, 2 at $1,000 each; stenographer, $1,000; temporary clerk hire, $600; in all, $12,100.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 19, after "$2,500," to insert "stenographer, $1,200," and in line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$5,000" and insert "$6,200," so as to make the clause read:

Minimum Wage Board: Secretary, $2,500; stenographer, $1,200; clerical, contingent, and miscellaneous expenses, $2,500; in all, $6,200, to be paid wholly out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, beginning in line 1, page 56, to insert:

The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized and empowered to sell to the highest bidder at public auction the following-named property belonging to the said District of Columbia, in the District of Columbia: Lots 821 and 822 in square 3064, together with all improvements thereon: Provided, That if in the opinion of the said commissioners the highest bid made at said sale for any or all of said lots and improvements thereon is not a full and fair price for the same, the said commissioners shall have the right to reject such bid or bids and shall have the right to sell said property, after due advertisement, to the highest bidder under competitive proposals for the purchase of said property; and that the proceeds of the sale of said lots and improvements thereon shall be applied to the purchase of a site for a new school building to be located north of U Street and east of Fourteenth Street NW.: Provided further, That upon recommendation of the board of education provision shall be made for library accommodations in the buildings or additions to buildings herein provided when the funds available are sufficient to make such provision.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Metropolitan police," on page 62, line 21, after "$1,200," to strike out "2 at $1,000 each; 1 $900, 1 $800" and insert "4 at $1,080 each"; on page 63, line 2, after the word "expenses," to strike out "$14,940" and insert "$17,500"; and in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$27,560," so as to make the clause read:

House of detention: To enable the commissioners to provide transportation, including purchase and maintenance of necessary horses, wagons, and harness, and a suitable place for the reception, transportation, and detention of children under 17 years of age, and, in the discretion of the commissioners, of girls and women over 17 years of age, arrested by the police on charge of offense against any law in force in the District of Columbia, or held as witnesses, or held pending final investigation or examination, or otherwise, including 2 clerks, at $1,000 each; 2 drivers, at $780 each; attendants—1 $1,200, 4 at $1,080 each; cook, $500; laundress, $500; janitor, $600; miscellaneous expenses, including clinic supplies, food, upkeep and repair of building, fuel, gas, ice, laundry, supplies, and equipment, electricity, maintenance of motor station vehicle, and other necessary expenses, $17,500; in all $27,560, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

Mr. SMOOT. On page 63, line 2, I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "$17,500" and inserting "$33,500."

Mr. CURTIS. I suggest that we make it "$34,940."

Mr. SMOOT. That is the amount of the estimate?

Mr. CURTIS. It is.

Mr. SMOOT. Very well. In other words, if they undertake to remodel the old Emergency Hospital, for which this item is to be used, it ought to be done all at once, and not at two different times.

Mr. CURTIS. I send to the desk an amendment to the amendment, which corrects the situation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 63, line 2, strike out the figures "$17,500," as proposed by the committee, and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$34,940," and make the total $45,620.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items under harbor patrol, on page 63, line 7, after the word "incidentals," to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$4,000," so as to make the clause read:

For fuel, construction, maintenance, repairs, and incidentals, $4,000.

And in line 9, after the words "In all," to strike out "$8,800" and insert "$9,300."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Health Department," on page 67, line 19, after the word "harness," to strike out "$7,000" and insert "$8,000," so as to make the clause read:

For maintenance of disinfecting service, including salaries or compensation for personal services when ordered in writing by the commissioners and necessary for maintenance of said service, and for purchase and maintenance of necessary horses, wagons, and harness, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 6, page 68, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Bacteriological laboratory: For maintaining and keeping in good order, and for the purpose of reference books and scientific periodicals, $1,000.

Mr. CURTIS. On page 68, line 5, I offer the following committee amendment, to correct a misprint.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 68, line 5, strike out the word "purpose" and insert in lieu thereof the word "purchase."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 14, page 70, the last paragraph read being as follows:

For clinical examination, advice, care, and maintenance of children under 6 years of age, under a contract to be made with the Washington Diet Kitchen by the health officer of the District of Columbia, $15,000.

Mr. CURTIS. On page 70, line 13, I move to amend by striking out the words "Washington Diet Kitchen" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "Child Welfare Society."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Courts," on page 70, line 21, after the word "officer," to strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,000"; and, on page 71, line 2, after the words "in all," to strike out "$5,385" and insert "$4,985," so as to make the clause read:

Probation system, supreme court: Probation officer, $2,000; assistant probation officer, $1,400; stenographer and typewriter and assistant, $900; contingent expenses, $325; maintenance of motor vehicle used in performance of official duties, at not to exceed $30 per month, $360; in all, $4,985.

Mr. CURTIS. On page 70, line 22, the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] desires to have the amendment amended so as to make the salary of the probation officer $2,200 instead of $2,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will report the amendment to the amendment.

The READING CLERK. On page 70, line 22, after the words "probation officer," strike out "$2,400" and insert "$2,200."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the items for juvenile court, on page 71, line 9, after the words "probation officers—chief," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 11, to reduce the salary of the assistant chief probation officer from "$1,500" to "$1,400."

Mr. CURTIS. That amendment I hope will be disagreed to. That officer has been receiving $1,500 since 1918, and I think his salary should remain the same. When we changed it in committee we thought it was an increase of salary.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 71, in line 11, after the words "two at," to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,260," and in line 16, after the words "in all," to strike out "$28,480" and insert "$28,700," so as to make the paragraph read:

Juvenile court: Judge, $3,600; clerk, $2,000; deputy clerk, who is authorized to act as clerk in the absence of that officer, $1,480; financial clerk, who is authorized to act as deputy clerk, $1,200; stenographer and typewriter, who is authorized to act as a deputy clerk, $1,080; stenographer and typewriter for judge's work and to aid in keeping records in clerk's office, $1,080; probation officers—chief, $2,000; assistant chief (who shall also be investigating officer for children's cases), $1,500, 2 at $1,260 each, 1 for adult cases $1,200, 4 at $1,000 each; investigating officer for adult cases, $1,200; record and information clerk for probation office, $1,200; clerk for probation office, $900; 2 bailiffs, at $900 each; telephone operator, $600; messenger, $600; janitor, $600; charwoman, $240; in all, $28,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Courts and prisons," on page 75, line 23, before the word "charwomen," to strike out "6" and insert "8," and in line 24, after the words "in all," to strike out "$16,920" and insert "$17,400," so as to make the clause read:

Courthouse, District of Columbia: For care and protection, under the direction of the United States marshal of the District of Columbia: Engineer, $1,200; electrician, $900; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; 5 laborers, at $600 each; 6 messengers, at $720 each; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each; clerk to jury commissioner, $720; telephone operator, $720; attendant in ladies' waiting room, $300; 8 charwomen, at $240 each; in all $17,400, to be expended under the direction of the Attorney General.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Charities and corrections," on page 77, line 9, after the word "stenographer," to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,400"; in line 11, after the word "each," to strike out "1 $840" and insert "2 at $840 each"; and in line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$20,340" and insert "$21,380," so as to make the clause read:

Board of Charities: Secretary, $3,500; assistant secretary and stenographer, $1,600; clerk, $1,400; clerk and stenographer, $1,400; messenger, $600; inspectors—2 at $1,200 each, 3 at $1,000 each, 2 at $900 each, 2 at $840 each; drivers—1 (who shall also act as foreman of stables) $900, 3 at $720 each; hostler, $540; traveling expenses, including attendance on conventions, $400; in all, $21,380.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 77, line 17, after the word "ambulances," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,400," so as to make the clause read:

For the maintenance of three motor ambulances, $2,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Reformatories and correction institutions," on page 81, after line 9, to insert:

Hereafter the commissioners are authorized, under such regulations as they may prescribe, to sell the surplus products of the Home for the Aged and Infirm, and all moneys derived from such sales shall be paid into the Treasury, one-half to the credit of the United States and one-half to the credit of the District of Columbia: Provided, That a report of the amount derived from such sales shall be made annually in the Book of Estimates.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 81, line 25, before the word "matron," to insert "treasurer," and on page 82, line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$11,880" and insert "$12,480," so as to make the clause read:

National Training School for Girls: Superintendent, $1,200; treasurer, matron, and 4 teachers, at $600 each; overseer, $720; 2 parole officers, at $600 each; 7 teachers of industries, at $480 each; engineer, $720; assistant engineer, $600; night watchman, $480; 2 laborers, at $300 each; in all, $12,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, line 18, after the words "School for Girls," to strike out "$56,880" and insert "$57,480," so as to make the clause read:

In all, National Training School for Girls, $57,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 82, after line 19, to insert:

On and after July 1, 1920, appropriations made for the National Training School for Girls shall be disbursed by the disbursing officer of the District of Columbia in the manner now provided by law for expenditure from appropriations for general expenses of the government of said District.

The amendment was agreed to.

Children's Hospital, $12,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 10, after the word "Hospital," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$14,000," so as to make the clause read:

Providence Hospital, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 11, after the word "Hospital," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$14,000," so as to make the clause read:

Garfield Memorial Hospital, $14,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 12, after the word "Hospital," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$22,000," so as to make the clause read:

Central Dispensary and Emergency Hospital, $22,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 83, line 14, after the word "Hospital," to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$15,000," so as to make the clause read:

Eastern Dispensary and Casualty Hospital, $15,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 84, after line 13, to strike out:

Gallinger Municipal Hospital: For continuing the construction of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital, $100,000.

And insert:

Gallinger Municipal Hospital: The Commissioners of the District of Columbia are authorized to enter into a contract or contracts for the construction of the Gallinger Municipal Hospital and accessory buildings in accordance with approved plans at a limit of cost not to exceed $1,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Child-caring institutions," on page 85, line 1, after "$1,800," to insert "assistant agent, $1,260"; in line 3, before the words "at $1,200 each," to strike out "2" and insert "3"; and in line 5, after the words "in all," to strike out "$18,200," and insert "$20,660," so as to make the clause read:

Officers and members of the Metropolitan police and the fire department of the District of Columbia shall be allowed increased compensation for the fiscal year 1921 in accordance with the provisions of section 6 of the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation act for the fiscal year 1921 at one-half the rate allowed to other employees in said section.

Mr. CURTIS. I offer an amendment to the amendment. In line 12, after the words "District of Columbia," I move to insert the words "and the United States park police."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I offered an amendment to the bill some time ago for the relief of Edith D. Macon, daughter and sole heir at law of Davis W. and Elizabeth L. W. Bailey, deceased, proposing to pay the sum of $3,127.85 in full settlement of the award for $10,519.20 made to the estate of Davis W. Bailey, July 18, 1892, for extra work under his contract for laying asphalt pavement in the District of Columbia. I proposed the amendment to the pending bill because it had heretofore more than once been offered as an amendment to the District of Columbia appropriation bill. A bill for this purpose, as a matter of fact, passed the Senate in the days gone by, so long ago that the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, but for some reason or other the sum has never been finally paid.

I have talked with the Senator who has the bill in charge and he tells me that the amendment was given consideration by the committee and that the committee thought it ought to be included in a deficiency appropriation bill. I wonder if I may have the assurance of the Senator having the bill in charge that he will insist on having the claim put on that appropriation bill.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I wish to state that the subcommittee gave this claim very careful consideration. We went so far as to send for the Commissioners of the District of Columbia to get their judgment with reference to the claim. After very careful consideration the subcommittee came to the conclusion that it was a claim which it would be unwise to place on the District appropriation bill. When the matter came up later in full committee the question was discussed and it was generally understood that the claim should go on a deficiency appropriation bill.

I will state that, so far as I am concerned, having given the matter the consideration I have as chairman of the subcommittee, that if the Senator offers it as an amendment on the general deficiency bill I shall do all I can to help him have it incorporated in that measure.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Mr. President, I certainly will appreciate that. This relief bill has been playing battledore and shuttlecock in the Senate for years. As far back as March 10, 1902, the then distinguished chairman of the District Committee, Senator Gallinger, now deceased, recommended its payment. Again in 1912, 10 years afterwards, the same distinguished Senator reported the bill again with a recommendation that it pass. It did pass in the Fifty-seventh Congress, but still the money is not paid.

It does seem to me sometimes that the poorest paymaster in the world is the United States Government, and that the poorer the claimant the more difficult it is to get a bill through for his relief. I do not know why it is, but it is so. The original claimants are dead, all of them have passed beyond, and this unfortunate woman has a claim that ought to have been paid to her ancestors, but she is still here knocking at the door of the United States and asking for the payment of the claim.

I shall ask that the amendment be added to the general deficiency appropriation bill when it comes up, and I do hope that the claim may be paid.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. Add to the bill a new section, as follows:

Upon the filing by the owners in the surveyor's office of the District of Columbia a dedication of the land necessary to extend Rittenhouse Street from the Metropolitan Branch of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co. east to Sligo Mill Road, through parcels or tracts of land known as 115/51 and 115/52, the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and directed, within 30 days thereafter, to institute and prosecute proceedings in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia holding a district court, for the condemnation of the land necessary for the remainder of said street, so as to extend same from its present terminus at Blair Road east to Sligo Mill Road.

Such proceedings shall be governed as to assessment of damages and benefits under the laws of said District provided for the condemnation and extension of streets and avenues. And when the land for said street is so dedicated and condemned, the said street shall be taken and used with its present grade at said railroad tracks with the same intent and meaning as any other street so situated, any law or regulation to the contrary notwithstanding.

Mr. CURTIS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CALDER. Certainly.

Mr. CURTIS. Does this amendment in any way involve an appropriation of money?

Mr. CALDER. It does not. It is simply a street-opening matter that is very much desired by the Order of the Eastern Star Hospital here in town.

Mr. CURTIS. I have no objection to the amendment. I understand the property is to be dedicated by the property owners on each side. If no other Senator objects to the amendment it may be inserted in the bill.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to ask who is going to pay for the improvement of the street after it is opened?

Mr. CALDER. I understand the original improvement of streets in this city is done by assessing the abutting property owners.

Mr. SMOOT. Half of it, and only half.

Mr. CALDER. Of course, the Senator from Utah knows more about it than I do, but it was my impression that the original improvement was entirely paid for by assessing the abutting property owners.

Mr. SMOOT. One-half of the amount is paid by the owners of the abutting property.

Mr. CALDER. I am not interested in it except that I was asked to introduce the amendment, and it seemed to me to be a matter to which there could be no objection. It is very much desired, and if there is any objection urged to it in conference, I shall have no complaint if the conferees throw it out.

Mr. SMOOT. If there is nothing in the amendment guaranteeing that the abutting property owners shall pay the expense of the improvement of the street, the Senate may just as well know now as later that if the road is improved the Government of the United States and the District of Columbia will have to pay one-half of the cost of the improvement.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, the amendment was brought to my attention only this morning, and I was advised that it called for no appropriation. I understand now that it does, and, as it has not been estimated for by the department, I make the point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CALDER. There is nothing in the amendment providing for the paving of the street at all. It only proposes to initiate proceedings to permit its opening. There is nothing in it at all which requires subsequent legislation to pave the street.

Mr. SMOOT. But does not the Senator think that if Congress authorizes the opening of the street in the very next District bill which will be before Congress an appropriation will be asked to improve the street? If not, they had better not do anything with it.

Mr. CALDER. When that time comes we can take the matter up.

Mr. SMOOT. We are virtually obligating ourselves to go on with the road and improve it. Of course, if the Senator from Kansas [Mr. CURTIS] wants to allow it to go into the bill for further investigation with a view, if he finds that to improve the road the Government of the United States will have to provide the money, that it shall go out in conference, I have not any objection.

Mr. CURTIS. I will state to the Senator from Utah that that was my object. I was told that there would be no appropriation carried in this item. I have not had time to look into it, and, in order to save discussion, I make the point of order that the item was not estimated for by the District Commissioners.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I submit another amendment, which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 60, at the beginning of line 16, it is proposed to strike out the word "nineteen" and to insert the word "twenty," and at the end of the same line, following the word "one," to insert "including one driver heretofore paid from the appropriation for transportation of prisoners."

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the Senator from New York if the driver involved is a member of the police force of the District of Columbia?

Mr. CALDER. This man has been a driver of the van that takes the prisoners from the courts to the house of detention and the prison. He was overlooked, I will say, when we passed the police bill early in this session, at which time we put all the patrol drivers in the uniformed police service. This amendment affects one man, a man who has been a van driver here for 45 years, and it seems to me is meritorious.

Mr. CURTIS. So far as I am concerned, I shall not object to the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. CALDER. I offer another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. It is also proposed, on page 80, line 5, after the word "Jail," to strike out the words "including salary of driver, not to exceed $1,000"; and in line 8, to strike out "$5,200" and to insert "$4,200."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment is agreed to without objection.

Mr. CALDER. I submit another amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from New York will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 49, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "$1,200" and insert in lieu thereof "$1,500," so as to read:

For 10 graduate nurses, 3 of whom shall be colored, who shall act as public-school nurses, at $1,500 each.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order against that amendment that it has not been estimated for by the District Commissioners.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is sustained. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendments, the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask unanimous consent that the Secretary may be authorized to correct all totals requiring correction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, it will be so ordered.

CALLING THE ROLL.

Mr. CURTIS. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The roll was called, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hale	McKellar	Smith, Md.
Ball	Harris	McNary	Smoot
Calder	Henderson	Nelson	Sterling
Capper	Jones, N. Mex.	New	Sutherland
Chamberlain	Jones, Wash.	Nugent	Swanson
Comer	Kellogg	Overman	Thomas
Culberson	Kendrick	Page	Trammell
Curtis	Keyes	Phelan	Underwood
Dial	King	Phipps	Wadsworth
Dillingham	Knox	Pittman	Warren
France	Lenroot	Ransdell
Gay	Lodge	Sheppard
Glass	McCumber	Shields

The VICE PRESIDENT. Forty-nine Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PAGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 13108, being the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Naval Affairs with amendments.

Mr. PAGE. I ask unanimous consent that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with; that it be read at this time for amendments, and that in the consideration of amendments the committee amendments be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection?

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the Senator from Vermont does that mean to dispense with the entire reading of the bill?

Mr. PAGE. No; it will be read, but the committee amendments will be considered as the reading proceeds.

Mr. KING. Very well; I have no objection.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered. The bill will be read for action upon the amendments of the committee.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the head of "Pay, miscellaneous," on page 4, line 2, after the word "jurisdiction," to insert "and for payment of"; and, in line 3, after the words "in all," to strike out "$3,550,000" and insert "$5,332,000," so as to make the clause read:

For commissions and interest; transportation of funds; exchange; mileage to officers of the Navy and Naval Reserve Force while traveling under orders in the United States, and for actual personal expenses of officers of the Navy and Naval Reserve Force while traveling abroad under orders, and for traveling expenses of civilian employees, and for mileage, at 5 cents per mile, to midshipmen entering the Naval Academy while proceeding from their homes to the Naval Academy for examination and appointment as midshipmen; for actual traveling expenses of female nurses; actual expenses of officers while on shore patrol duty; hire of launches or other small boats in Asiatic waters; for rent of buildings and offices not in navy yards; expenses of courts-martial, prisoners and prisons, and courts of inquiry, boards of inspection, examining boards, with clerks, and witnesses' fees, and traveling expenses and costs; expenses of naval defense districts; stationery and recording; religious books; newspapers and periodicals for the naval service; all advertising for the Navy Department and its bureaus (except advertising for recruits for the Bureau of Navigation); copying; ferriage; tolls; costs of suits; commissions, warrants, diplomas, and discharges; relief of vessels in distress; recovery of valuables from shipwrecks; quarantine expenses; reports; professional investigation; cost of special instruction at home and abroad, including maintenance of students and attachés: Provided, That this appropriation and the appropriation "Pay, Marine Corps," shall be available for special allowances for maintenance to officers and enlisted men of the Navy and Marine Corps serving under unusual conditions; information from abroad, and the collection and classification thereof; all charges pertaining to the Navy Department and its bureaus for ice for the cooling of drinking water on shore (except at naval hospitals), telephone rentals and tolls, telegrams, cablegrams, and postage, foreign and domestic, and post-office box rentals; and other necessary and incidental expenses: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $1,000,000 and for necessary expenses for the interned persons and prisoners of war under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department, including funeral expenses for such interned persons or prisoners of war as may die while under such jurisdiction, and for payment of claims for damages under naval act approved July 11, 1919; in all, $5,332,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 4, line 19, after the word "oil," to insert "and other fuel"; in line 20, after the word "oil," to strike out "and"; in the same line, after the word "gasoline," to insert "and other fuel"; and on page 5, line 5, before the word "employment," to strike out "temporary," so as to read:

Investigation of fuel oil and other fuel: For an investigation of fuel oil, gasoline, and other fuel adapted to naval requirements, including the question of supply and storage and the availability economically and otherwise of such supply as may be allowed by the naval reserves on the public domain, and for such other expenses for transportation and hire of vehicles in connection with naval petroleum reserves, as the Secretary of the Navy may deem appropriate, for the purchase of necessary instruments and appliances, for the extension of the naval fuel-oil testing plant at the navy yard, Philadelphia, Pa., and the employment of civilian experts and assistants.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 5, in line 6, after the word "assistants," to insert "at Washington, D. C., and elsewhere," and in line 7, after the word "elsewhere," to strike out "$30,000" and insert "$50,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is directed to take possession of all properties within the naval petroleum reserves as are or may become vested in the United States; to conserve, develop, use and operate the same in his discretion, directly or by contract, lease or otherwise, and to use, store, exchange, refine, sell, or otherwise dispose of the oil and gas products thereof, and those from all royalty oil, for the benefit of the United States: And provided further, That such sums as have been or may be turned into the Treasury of the United States from royalties on lands within the naval petroleum reserves prior to July 1, 1921, not to exceed $500,000, are hereby made available for this purpose until July 1, 1922: Provided further, That this appropriation shall be reimbursed from the proper appropriations on account of the oil and gas products from said properties used by the United States at such rate, not in excess of the market value of the oil, as the Secretary of the Navy may direct."

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask the chairman of the committee if he will not pass over that amendment.

Mr. PAGE. Certainly.

Mr. LODGE. It is one which the committee has not finally decided upon with regard to form, and I think we had better pass it over.

Mr. PAGE. I shall be very glad to have it passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, there is an amendment on page 5, beginning at line 7, providing that "the Secretary of the Navy is directed to take possession of all property within the naval petroleum reserves," and so forth.

Mr. LODGE. That is what I had passed over.

Mr. SMOOT. That went over?

Mr. LODGE. That went over. It is all one amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. All right.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will read it, he will see that it is all one amendment. You have to take out the amount appropriated, because it connects with the other. Of course, there is no objection to the words "Washington, D. C., and elsewhere, $50,000."

Mr. SMOOT. No.

Mr. LODGE. It is the proviso that I want to have go over, and it has all gone over.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to make a point of order on it as soon as I can.

Mr. LODGE. I will say to the Senator that that amendment will be modified and I think may meet his objection.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 6, line 11, after the word "purposes," to strike out "$15,876,000" and insert "$25,000,000," so as to read:

Aviation, Navy: For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for procuring, producing, constructing, operating, preserving, storing, and handling aircraft, establishment and maintenance of aircraft stations, for experimental work in development of aviation for naval purposes, and for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes, $25,000,000, to be expended as follows.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I ask that that item may be passed over until we dispose of the various items which together aggregate that amount.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, all those items are for one purpose, and that is to increase the appropriations for aviation. If one goes, they will all go.

Mr. KING. If the Senator will pardon me, I desire, when we reach one or two of the amendments farther on, to make some inquiry concerning them. If there should be a reduction in those items, it would necessitate some little change in the total.

Mr. LODGE. Oh, of course the total should be corrected, as it always is.

Mr. KING. I have no objection, with that understanding.

Mr. LODGE. But as far as this question of aviation goes, we might as well discuss it now as at any time, I think.

Mr. KING. I do not know that I shall have any discussion. I simply want to ask a question when we come to one or two of the items farther on.

Mr. LODGE. All of those items ought to be considered together. They are all part of the same thing.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. Mr. President, I understood the Senator to say that he had no objection, provided the total was looked after.

Mr. LODGE. The totals will be looked after by the clerks.

Mr. KING. I have no objection to agreeing upon the total, providing that if there is any diminution in any of these items we will not have to go back and move to reconsider.

Mr. LODGE. Certainly not. The total will be changed, of course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the total is agreed to.

Mr. LODGE. But those aviation appropriations have not yet been read.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. The committee proposes, on page 6, line 11, to strike out "$15,876,000" and in lieu thereof to insert "$25,000,000."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands that that amendment is agreed to, with the understanding that if, in the consideration of the subsequent items, the amounts are changed the clerks will change the total to correspond to them.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 6, line 12, after the word "aircraft," to strike out "$3,464,400" and insert "$6,500,000," so as to read:

For necessary aircraft, $6,500,000.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I owe an apology to the chairman of the committee for not being familiar with these items. I was unable to attend the sessions of the committee when it was considering this bill, being absent. With the information which I now possess, I am not satisfied with these appropriations. It seems to me that they are entirely too much—the item of $6,500,000 for necessary aircraft; the item of $5,400,000 for new construction at stations; the item of $7,075,000 for maintenance and operation of aircraft factory, helium plant, air stations, fleet activities, and conversion of tenders, testing laboratories, and overhauling planes; and the item of $3,700,000 for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft.

Mr. President, I do not believe that the situation now calls for the large expenditures for these purposes that are provided for here. It seems to me that there is a duplication, too, with respect to a number of the items. For instance, for necessary aircraft $6,500,000 is appropriated, and then, for new construction at stations, $5,400,000. I am not sure whether that $5,400,000 relates to buildings or relates to aircraft proper. If it relates to buildings, it seems to me the appropriation is entirely too much, because we know that during the war we spent a great many millions in the construction of buildings, and it would seem to me that we have sufficient, as the aftermath of the war, to avoid expending this large sum now for that purpose.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, if the Senator desires I can give him the items making up the $5,400,000.

Mr. KING. I should be glad to get any information the Senator cares to give.

Mr. PAGE. The items are as follows:

Air station at Rockaway, nothing.
Station at Cape May, $30,000.
Station at Hampton Roads, $20,000.
Station at San Diego, $180,000.
Station at Pensacola, $270,000.
Existing activities:
At Yorktown, nothing.
At Quantico, $155,000.
At Paris Island, $87,000.
At Great Lakes, $100,000.
At Charleston, $50,000.
At Lakehurst, $459,000.
At New London, nothing.
The proposed activities cover the following:
Rigid Station, Fla., $100,000.
Rigid Station, West Coast, $2,775,000.
Dutch Flats, $65,000.
Boston, nothing.
Narragansett Bay, $81,000.
Philadelphia, nothing.
Annapolis, nothing.
Guantanamo, $97,000.
Culebra, nothing.
Portsmouth, N. H., nothing.
San Pedro, Calif., $81,000.
Hawaiian Islands, $930,000.
Astoria, nothing.
Port Angeles, nothing.
West Coast storage, nothing.

Those are the items. If the Senator desires to go into further details we can refer to the Book of Estimates, and, I think, can go still deeper; but those are the items that are reported upon which this estimate of $5,480,000 has been suggested.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator whether those various amounts are required for the construction of buildings?

Mr. PAGE. This is all new construction, I believe, at stations.

Mr. KING. Did the committee believe that $900,000 was required at Pearl Harbor for the construction of buildings for naval airplanes?

Mr. PAGE. I should like to correct myself. The footings are not given for each item here, but they are under the head of "Stations," "Existing activities," and "Proposed activities." The $930,000 is the amount which the department say is necessary for this work.

Mr. KING. At Hawaii?

Mr. PAGE. At Hawaii; yes, sir.

Mr. KING. For buildings?

Mr. PAGE. For all work connected with the whole matter of aviation.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not sufficiently advised as to these various items, but I confess that they do not strike me as being proper or needed.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, as I understand the matter, the whole question of aviation may be considered here as well as anywhere. The House recommended $15,876,000. The Senate committee took up this matter with a good deal of care, and decided that we had not made as large appropriations for aviation as we ought. The Senator will remember that last year we appropriated $25,000,000, and after full consideration we were unanimously of the opinion that that sum ought to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

Mr. KING. Without desiring to be critical, Mr. President, I confess that after making some little investigation I have been unable to ascertain what became of the $25,000,000; that is to say, I do not think the results justified the expenditures.

Mr. PAGE. I have this memorandum, which I think touches upon this point pretty well:

The effect of this amendment is to increase the appropriation for aviation in the sum of $9,124,000. War experience is so recent that the vital importance of aviation to all military operations ashore and afloat is still a matter of common knowledge. Money judiciously spent now for attacking the problem will save considerable wastage later. It was agreed that this matter is urgent. The development of the aviation branch of the Navy of the United States should not be permitted to lag behind that of the naval services of other Governments. It is believed that adequate funds for aviation purposes should be made available by this Congress. The Senate committee were unanimous in their opinion that the importance of aviation warranted this additional expenditure.

The sum of $25,000,000, as recommended by the committee, has been itemized in accordance with a statement furnished by the officer in charge of naval aviation.

That I have read.

The various amounts are those compiled by the proper officials of the department based on the proposed program of aviation activities for the next fiscal year.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I desire to say only a few words. The full committee gave very careful attention to this important addition to the appropriations. We were not fortunate enough to have the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] with us; he was absent from the Senate at the time; but all the items were considered with great care, and the report of the committee was unanimous.

There lies at the bottom of this appropriation the policy we are going to pursue with regard to naval aviation. There can be no doubt that the naval flying machine, the hydroairplane, is now and will be one of the most important branches of naval defense. To deprive the Navy under modern conditions of an air service would be like cutting off an arm—it would be almost a deadly blow. It can not be done, in the opinion of the committee, for the sum appropriated by the House. It all turns on the total appropriation.

The defense of the Nation is not a subject for economy. It is false economy to cut down the appropriations which are necessary for the Navy as a naval military force. I am as adverse to wasting money or to the careless and heedless expenditure of money as anyone can possibly be.

This does not come even under the head of those appropriations which can wait, which need not be made at this time. It is for the immediate protection of the country, and to cut and pare such appropriations is not economy; it is wanton extravagance; it is inviting danger.

The Hawaiian station, Pearl Harbor, to which the Senator particularly alluded, is perhaps the most important single item, although it is but a small part of the total appropriation, because that is our outpost in the Pacific. The Pacific coast needs naval defense more than the Atlantic coast at this time, and it needs it now, and everything must be done to strengthen that defense not merely in the fleet, but in all the appurtenances of the fleet and all that is necessary to give it its highest efficiency.

Pearl Harbor is very important to the Aviation Service. It is an integral part of the defense of the Pacific coast. If we are going to make the appropriation which the committee of the Senate regards as absolutely essential, then all these allotments ought to go as they have been arranged not only by the care of the department but by the care of the committee.

The question, and the only real question, is whether we are going to make an appropriation sufficient to maintain the naval aviation, and that depends on the addition of ten millions, which the committee proposes. There is nothing in the bill, in my judgment, so important to the safety of the United States as this item.

Mr. SMITH of Maryland. I suggest to the Senator that the probabilities are that one-half of our Navy will be on the Pacific coast, and therefore the great importance of supplying this arm for the protection of that portion of the Navy.

Mr. LODGE. I thank the Senator for the suggestion. That is absolutely true. It is one of the most important arguments for it. We not only must have the Navy, we must have a capable independent fleet on the Pacific coast, and the sooner we meet that the better. If danger is coming, it is coming there.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, just a word. I do not disagree with my distinguished friend, the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], generally speaking. It has been the policy of our Government for many years to build up an adequate Navy. It has been felt that the defense of this country rested upon the Navy rather than upon a large standing Army. With that policy I do not think any patriotic American can complain.

It does seem to me, however, that in these days of peace to expend approximately $1,000,000,000 for military and naval purposes for one year is imposing too great a burden on the taxpayers and upon the people. I am afraid that there is not sufficient economy in the administration of the War and Navy Departments, if we are to spend approximately $1,000,000,000 this coming year for the Military and Naval establishments.

Mr. President, I do not know what the bill of Great Britain will be for the coming year for her navy, but I believe it will be less than this; and when we remember the expenditures of the Government before entering the war, and when we take into account the tremendous burdens we will have to bear for the coming year, it occurs to me that approximately a billion dollars is too much for the Army and the Navy.

I appreciate the fact that to attack this bill successfully there must be an adequate knowledge of each particular item. I do not have a sufficient knowledge respecting these items to challenge attention particularly to any one as being extravagant. But remembering the appropriation we made last year for naval aviation, and counting the results of that appropriation, I have not any hesitancy in saying that the amount which is called for in this bill is entirely too much. I think the aggregate amount of the bill is too much.

The House passed a bill appropriating $425,289,574. The Senate committee has added to that more than $40,000,000, and the report of the committee bearing upon it states that the amount appropriated by the bill for purely naval purposes is $466,236,574. It is interesting to note that the estimates submitted in November, 1919, for the support of the Naval Establishment for the fiscal year 1921 totals $573,131,254.80, and then there were formal supplemental estimates aggregating $9,500,000, then a supplemental recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy for new ship construction, to cost $195,000,000, one-half of which was recommended to be made available in the next fiscal year, which would be $98,000,000. So the total amount requested for the Naval Establishment for the next fiscal year was $680,681,254.80.

Yet this is a Republic and we are two years removed from the war. We are now asked to appropriate the stupendous sum of more than half a billion dollars for the current year. It is entirely too much, and in my judgment it will not meet with the approval of the American people.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 6, in line 14, after the word "aircraft," to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$400,000"; in line 16, after the word "stations," to strike out "$1,257,000"; in line 17, after the word "training," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$150,000"; in line 18, after the word "plant," to strike out "aircraft" and insert "air"; in line 19, after the word "activities," to insert "and conversion of tenders"; in line 20, after the word "planes," to strike out "$6,044,600" and insert "$7,075,000"; in line 21, after the word "work," to strike out "for"; in line 22, after the word "aircraft," to strike out "$2,935,000" and insert "$3,700,000"; and on page 7, line 15, before "continental," to insert "the"; so as to read:

Aviation, Navy: For aviation, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for procuring, producing, constructing, operating, preserving, storing, and handling aircraft, establishment and maintenance of aircraft stations, for experimental work in development of aviation for naval purposes, and for the purchase or manufacture and issue of special clothing, wearing apparel, and similar equipment for aviation purposes, $25,000,000, to be expended as follows: For necessary aircraft, $6,500,000; for necessary equipment for heavier-than-air and lighter-than-air craft, $400,000; to continue authorized construction of one rigid airship, $1,500,000; for new construction at stations, $5,400,000; for new equipment for training, $150,000; for maintenance and operation of aircraft factory, helium plant, air stations, fleet activities, and conversion of tenders, testing laboratories, and for overhauling of planes, $7,075,000; for continuing experiments and development work on all types of aircraft, $3,700,000; for pay of classified force, $275,000; and the money herein specifically appropriated for "Aviation" shall be disbursed and accounted for in accordance with existing law as "Aviation" and for that purpose shall constitute one fund: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for drafting, clerical, inspection, and messenger service for aircraft stations shall not exceed $275,000: Provided further, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to consider, ascertain, adjust, determine, and pay out of this appropriation the amounts due on claims for damages which have occurred or may occur to private property growing out of the operations of naval aircraft, where such claim does not exceed the sum of $500: Provided further, That all claims adjusted under this authority during any fiscal year shall be reported in detail to the Congress by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended for maintenance of more than six heavier-than-air stations on the coasts of the continental United States: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for the construction of a factory for the manufacture of aeroplanes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Bureau of Navigation," on page 8, line 23, after the word "service," to insert "rental, maintenance, operation, exchange, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use," so as to make the clause read:

Transportation and recruiting: For travel allowance of enlisted men discharged on account of expiration of enlistment; transportation of enlisted men and apprentice seamen and applicants for enlistment at home and abroad, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation to their homes, if residents of the United States, of enlisted men and apprentice seamen discharged on medical survey, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of sick or insane enlisted men and apprentice seamen to hospitals, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of enlisted men of the Naval Reserve Force to and from duty, with subsistence and transfers en route, or cash in lieu thereof; transportation of civilian officers and crews of naval auxiliaries; apprehension and delivery of deserters and stragglers, and for railway guides and other expenses incident to transportation; expenses of recruiting for the naval service; rental, maintenance, operation, exchange, and repair of motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicles for official use; rent of rendezvous and expenses of maintaining the same; advertising for and obtaining men and apprentice seamen; actual and necessary expenses in lieu of mileage to officers on duty with traveling recruiting parties, $3,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 12, page 9, the last paragraph read being as follows:

Recreation for enlisted men: For the recreation, amusement, comfort, contentment, and health of the Navy, and for such other purposes of like character as the Secretary of the Navy may deem advisable, to be expended in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, under such regulations as he may prescribe: Provided, That not more than one person shall be employed hereunder at a rate of compensation exceeding $1,800 per annum, $800,000.

Mr. PAGE. I have been asked to allow this paragraph to be passed over until a later time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 9, after the word "ranges," to strike out "$100,000" and insert "$150,000," so as to make the clause read:

Gunnery and engineering exercises: Prizes, trophies, and badges for excellence in gunnery, target practice, engineering exercises, and for economy in fuel consumption, to be awarded under such rules as the Secretary of the Navy may formulate; for the purpose of printing, recording, classifying, compiling, and publishing the rules and results; for the establishment and maintenance of shooting galleries, target houses, targets, and ranges; for hiring established ranges, and for transporting equipment to and from ranges, $150,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 10, line 18, after the words "paid to," to strike out "officers" and insert "members," and in line 19, after the word "Force," to insert "which shall not exceed $100 for the first enrollment or $30 for any subsequent enrollment of enrolled (enlisted) men," so as to make the clause read:

Outfits on first enlistment: During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, the clothing and small stores fund shall be charged with the value of all issues of clothing and small stores made to enlisted men and apprentice seamen required as outfits on first enlistment, not to exceed $100 each, and for civilian clothing not to exceed $15 per man to men given discharges for bad conduct, undesirability, or inaptitude, and the uniform gratuity paid to members of the Naval Reserve Force, which shall not exceed $100 for the first enrollment or $30 for any subsequent enrollment of enrolled (enlisted) men.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 11, line 14, after the word "inspection," to strike out "$500,000" and insert "$1,200,000," so as to make the clause read:

Instruments and supplies: Supplies for seamen's quarters; and for the purchase of all other articles of equipage at home and abroad; and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith and manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; all pilotage and towage of ships of war; canal tolls, wharfage, dock and port charges, and other necessary incidental expenses of a similar nature; services and materials in repairing, correcting, adjusting, and testing compasses on shore and on board ship; nautical and astronomical instruments and repairs to same; libraries for ships of war, professional books, schoolbooks, and papers; maintenance of gunnery and other training classes; compasses, compass fittings, including binnacles, tripods, and other appendages of ship's compasses; logs and other appliances for measuring the ship's way, and leads and other appliances for sounding; photographs, photographic instruments and materials, printing outfit and materials; and for the necessary civilian electricians for gyrocompass testing and inspection, $1,200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 12, after the words "in all," to strike out "$125,000" and insert "$250,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval training station, California: Maintenance of naval training station, Yerba Buena Island, Calif.: Labor and material; buildings and wharves; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves; wharfage, ferriage, and street car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock, and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, tools, and repairs to same; fire engines and extinguishers, gymnastic implements, models, and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and materials, and maintenance of same; heating and lighting; stationery, books, schoolbooks, and periodicals; fresh water and washing; packing boxes and materials; and all other contingent expenses; maintenance of dispensary building; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen; in all, $250,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 5, after the words "in all," to strike out "$250,000" and insert "$300,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval training station, Rhode Island: Maintenance of naval training station, Rhode Island: Labor and material, buildings and wharves; dredging channels; extending sea walls; repairs to causeway and sea wall; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and wharves; wharfage, ferriage, and street car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of two horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes; fire engines and extinguishers; gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and materials and maintenance of same; heating and lighting; stationery, books, schoolbooks, and periodicals; fresh water and washing; packing boxes and materials; and all other contingent expenses; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen; in all, $300,000: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $15,701.60.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 5, after the words "Great Lakes," to strike out "$500,000" and insert "$600,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval training station, Great Lakes: Maintenance of naval training station: Labor and material; general care, repairs, and improvements of grounds, buildings, and piers; street car fare; purchase and maintenance of live stock and attendance on same; wagons, carts, implements, and tools, and repairs to same, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of one horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle to be used only for official purposes; fire apparatus and extinguishers; gymnastic implements; models and other articles needed in instruction of apprentice seamen; printing outfit and material and maintenance of same; heating and lighting and repairs to power-plant equipment, distributing mains, tunnel, and conduits; stationery, books, schoolbooks, and periodicals; washing; packing boxes and materials; lectures and suitable entertainments for apprentice seamen; and all other contingent expenses: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $45,000; in all, naval training station, Great Lakes, $600,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 14, after the words "in all," to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$500,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval training station, naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va.: Maintenance of naval training station at naval operating base, Virginia, labor and material, general care, repairs, and improvements; schoolbooks; and all other incidental expenses: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $25,000; in all, $500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 14, after line 14, insert the following:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized, in his discretion, to establish at each of the permanent naval training stations summer schools for boys between the ages of 16 and 20 years. For this purpose he is authorized to use such buildings, or other accommodations, at such training stations; to loan any naval equipment necessary for such purposes, and to give instructions which will fit them for service in the Navy of the United States. He is empowered to establish and enforce such rules within the camp as may be necessary and to detail such members of the naval personnel as may be required in order to encourage and execute the spirit of this act.

The Secretary of the Navy is further authorized to loan the necessary naval uniforms during the period of training and to furnish subsistence, medical attendance, and other necessary incidental expenses for those attending these schools: Provided, That those under instruction, with the consent of their parents or their guardians, shall enroll in the Naval Reserve Force for not less than three months, and no person not so enrolled shall be admitted to said training school. For carrying out the provisions of this paragraph the sum of $375,000 is appropriated.

Mr. KING. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, not quite understanding the first part of the amendment tendered, whether the purpose is to take into these schools civilians?

Mr. PAGE. Yes; any boy who wants to serve and receive the education to fit him for naval life may enroll in the Naval Reserve and obtain the benefits of this legislation.

Mr. KING. Does the Senator think that schools conducted under those circumstances would be calculated to obtain recruits for the Navy? Is that the purpose of the provision?

Mr. PAGE. The purpose of the provision is to give boys between 16 and 20 years of age an opportunity to receive an education that will fit them for naval life.

Mr. KING. No one could disagree with any proposition that would provide for properly training those who have enlisted in the Navy, but I am not quite clear as to the advisability of the Navy Department establishing schools wherever it sees fit for the purpose of educating civilians.

Mr. PAGE. I will say to the Senator that we had this matter under advisement for some time, and finally cut the appropriations from $750,000 to $375,000. These are the items:

Subsistence for two months	$105,000
Clothing, partial outfits, at $50 each	250,000
Overhead expenses	20,000

We have cut it down to the minimum, if we are to carry out the provision which seeks to educate boys in naval affairs.

Mr. SWANSON. If the Senator will permit me, I will state that in the Army reorganization bill we incorporated a provision for voluntary military training in the Army.

It is impossible to get recruits for the Navy unless an opportunity is afforded to educate boys who have naval proclivities. We have made a very restricted provision here. Under it about 5,000 boys a year can be called into the naval service. We go further and do better than we did with the Army. They go into these schools and receive instruction, say, 5,000 of them a year, and they are enrolled in the Naval Reserve Force for three months, and they enter the Naval Reserve. When they are in the Naval Reserve, if an emergency should arise or war should come on, the Government could call out all these men, so educated for these two or three months in the Naval Reserve, and have men efficient for some service, without paying them and keeping them in the service all during the interim.

To my mind it is one of the most efficient schemes for providing an efficient Naval Reserve and having a supply of men ready in case of war. I think it is one of the best provisions in the bill. The Senator from Utah will later realize that when he understands it. If each year we can take 5,000 boys and equip them for naval service and teach them to be expert seamen and put them in the Naval Reserve, where they must be retained for four years, subject to the orders of the Government, and pay them nothing, except during the time of instruction, and then be able to call on them in case of war, we have provided a very prompt and efficient way to have a Naval Reserve in time of emergency.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, line 16, after the word "Force," to insert "and Naval Militia"; in line 18, after the word "wharfage," to strike out "$50,000" and insert "$500,000"; and, in line 19, after the word "That," to insert "except in case of emergency," so as to make the clause read:

Naval Reserve Force: For expenses of organizing, administering, and recruiting the Naval Reserve Force and Naval Militia; for the maintenance and rental of armories, including the pay of necessary janitors, and for wharfage, $500,000: Provided, That except in case of emergency no part of the money appropriated in this act shall be used for the training of any member of the Naval Reserve Force except with his own consent.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 22, to insert:

Receiving barracks: Maintenance of receiving barracks, $200,000.

Mr. PAGE. At this point, on page 14, line 22, I wish to offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 14, at the end of line 22, after the word "consent," insert the following additional proviso:

Provided further, That of the Organized Militia as provided by law, such part of the same as may be duly prescribed in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia shall constitute a Naval Militia; and such Naval Militia as organized and prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy in General Order No. 153, dated July 10, 1915, by authority of the act of Congress which became a law February 16, 1914, shall be a part of the Naval Reserve Force; the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to maintain and provide for said Naval Militia as provided in said act of February 16, 1914: And provided further, That the members of said Naval Militia to secure the benefits of this act must enroll in the Naval Reserve Force and shall have all the benefits, gratuities, privileges, and emoluments as provided by law for other members of said Naval Reserve Force; and all duty performed in the Naval Militia shall, with the approval of the Secretary of the Navy, be counted as active service for maintenance of efficiency as provided by law for members of the Naval Reserve Force. All moneys appropriated for the Naval Reserve Force shall be, and hereby are, made available for the Naval Militia: And provided further, That all parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed as far as they affect the Naval Militia.

Mr. KING. May I inquire of the chairman of the committee whether this Naval Militia is confined to a few States or whether it applies to all the States?

Mr. PAGE. It may apply to all the States, as I understand it. I should like to read for the benefit of the Senator just a few sentences from a letter of the Secretary of the Navy:

The Naval Militia of New York, which is a very splendid body of men and did excellent work in the war, is in this position: That unless we restore the status which was prepared by a body of officers of the Navy of 1915, it is not permissible for the department to furnish arms, equipment, and vessels for training at the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy to the Naval Militia. Under the present laws, while the Naval Militia is ready and willing, I have not the authority to furnish them arms even in the greatest emergency, and therefore I am writing to suggest that you incorporate in the bill the inclosed amendment after the word "consent," on line 22, page 14. This will give substantially to the Naval Militia the same status as the Naval Militia had before the war and will preserve them as part of the Naval Reserve Force.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 16, after the word "secretary," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,200"; in line 17, after the word "mechanic," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,200"; in the same line, after the word "at," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,080"; in line 18, after the word "at," to strike out "$900" and insert "$1,200"; in line 22, before the word "laundresses," to strike out "two" and insert "five"; in line 23, after the word "each," to strike out "3 laundresses, at $300 each"; in line 25, before the word "waitresses," to strike out "4" and insert "10"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "4 waitresses, at $300 each"; on page 16, line 2, before the word "laborers," to strike out "7" and insert "5"; in line 7, after the word "each," to strike out "3" and insert "2"; in line 8, after the word "at" where it occurs the first time, to strike out "$600" and insert "$660"; in line 13, before the word "total," to insert "1 electrician, $1,400; 2 stenographers and typewriters, at $1,400 each; 1 stenographer and typewriter, $1,200; 1 stenographer and typewriter, $1,000; 1 telephone operator, $900"; and in the same line, after the word "employees," to strike out "$39,540" and insert "$47,280," so as to make the clause read:

Naval Home, Philadelphia, Pa., pay of employees: One secretary, $2,200; 1 foreman mechanic, $2,200; 1 superintendent of grounds, at $1,080; 1 steward, at $1,200; 1 store laborer, at $660; 1 matron and office assistant, at $720; 1 beneficiaries' attendant, at $480; 1 chief cook, at $660; 1 assistant cook, at $540; 1 assistant cook, at $480; 1 chief laundress, at $420; 5 laundresses, at $360 each; 1 chief scrubber, at $420; 3 scrubbers, at $360 each; 1 head waitress, at $480; 10 waitresses, at $360 each; 1 kitchen attendant, at $540; 5 laborers, at $600 each; 5 laborers, at $540 each; one stable keeper and driver, at $660; 1 master at arms, at $900; 2 house corporals, at $600 each; 1 barber, at $600; 1 carpenter, at $1,200; 1 painter, at $1,200; 1 painter, at $1,020; 1 engineer, $1,080; 4 laborers, at $720 each; 2 laborers, at $840 each; 1 laborer, at $660; 1 chauffeur, coal truck, at $960; 1 chauffeur, small truck, at $840; 1 chauffeur, governor's car, $840; 1 electrician, $1,400; 2 stenographers and typewriters, at $1,400 each; 1 stenographer and typewriter, $1,200; 1 stenographer and typewriter, $1,000; 1 telephone operator, $900; total for employees, $47,280.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 17, line 6, after the word "purposes," to strike out "$105,366" and insert "$110,366," and in line 7, after the word "Home," to strike out "$144,906" and insert "$157,646," so as to make the clause read:

Maintenance: Water rent, heating, and lighting; cemetery, burial expenses, and headstones; general care and improvements of grounds, buildings, walls, and fences; repairs to power-plant equipment, implements, tools, and furniture, and purchase of the same; music in chapel and entertainments for beneficiaries; stationery, books, and periodicals; transportation of indigent and destitute beneficiaries to the Naval Home, and of sick and insane beneficiaries, their attendants, and necessary subsistence for both, to and from other Government hospitals; employment of such beneficiaries in and about the Naval Home, as may be authorized by the Secretary of the Navy, on the recommendation of the governor; support of beneficiaries, and all other contingent expenses, including the maintenance, repair, and operation of one horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicle, two motor-propelled vehicles, and one motor-propelled passenger-carrying vehicle, to be used only for official purposes, $110,366; in all, Naval Home, $157,646, which sum shall be paid out of the income from the naval pension fund.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Ordnance," on page 18, line 9, after "$2,000,000," to insert "of which $100,000 is authorized for drafting and technical force to be employed in the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department at Washington, District of Columbia," so as to make the clause read:

Ordnance and ordnance stores: For procuring, producing, preserving, and handling ordnance material; for the armament of ships, for fuel, material, and labor to be used in the general work of the Ordnance Department; for furniture at naval ammunition depots, torpedo stations, naval ordnance plants, and proving grounds; for maintenance of proving grounds, powder factory, torpedo stations, gun factory, ammunition depots, and naval ordnance plants, and for target practice; for the maintenance, repair, or operation of horse-drawn and motor-propelled freight and passenger-carrying vehicles, to be used only for official purposes at naval ammunition depots, naval proving grounds, naval ordnance plants, and naval torpedo stations, and for the pay of chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots: Provided, That quarterly reports on all gasoline passenger and freight automobiles shall be made on form No. 124, and one copy of each report shall be filed in the Bureau of Yards and Docks: Provided further, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy for chemists, clerical, drafting, inspection, watchmen, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, naval ordnance plants, and naval ammunition depots for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $2,000,000, of which $100,000 is authorized for drafting and technical force to be employed in the Bureau of Ordnance, Navy Department at Washington, District of Columbia; in all, $17,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 14, to insert:

Torpedo station, Newport, R. I.: For labor and material; general care of and repairs to grounds, buildings, and wharves; boats, instruction, instruments, tools, experiments, and general torpedo outfits, $200,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Yards and Docks," on page 20, line 3, after the word "leave," to strike out "$6,500,000" and insert "$9,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

Maintenance, Bureau of Yards and Docks: For general maintenance of yards and docks, namely, for books, maps, models, and drawings; purchase and repair of fire engines; fire apparatus and plants; machinery; operation, repair, purchase, maintenance of horses and driving teams, carts, timber wheels, and all vehicles, including motor-propelled and horse-drawn passenger-carrying vehicles to be used only for official purposes, and including motor-propelled vehicles for freight-carrying puposes only for use in all navy yards and naval stations; tools and repair of the same; stationery; furniture for Government houses and offices in navy yards and naval stations; coal and other fuel; candles, oil, and gas; attendance on light and power plants; cleaning and clearing up yards and care of buildings; attendance on fires, lights, fire engines, and fire apparatus and plants; incidental labor at navy yards; water tax, tolls, and ferriage; pay of watchmen in navy yards; awnings and packing boxes; and pay for employees on leave, $9,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 21, line 23, after "$220,000," to insert "crane for building slip, $50,000; water-front improvements to continue, $250,000; in all, $520,000," so as to make the clause read:

Navy yard, Norfolk, Va.: Steel storage, to complete, $220,000; crane for building slip, $50,000; water-front improvements to continue, $250,000; in all, $520,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I suggest on page 22, after line 2, to insert the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 22, after line 2, it is proposed to insert the following:

Naval Station, Key West, Fla.: Distilling plant, $75,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 22, after line 4, to insert:

Docking and repair plant, San Francisco Bay: Toward the establishment of a docking and repair plant for capital ships on San Francisco Bay, including the development thereof with necessary facilities, $1,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy shall appoint a naval board to advise and report to Congress as to which of the two sites, Alameda, Calif., or Hunters Point, Calif., shall be most advantageous for the Government and the estimated cost of each, said report to be made not later than October 1, 1920.

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to exchange a tract of land containing 10.427 acres, more or less, owned by the United States, comprising a portion of the naval radio station, South San Francisco, Calif., for a tract of land containing 10.427 acres, more or less, owned by the South San Francisco Land & Improvement Co., to execute the necessary instruments to effect such an exchange, and to make just compensation to said company for dismantling radio mast and terminating existing lease, and the sum of $6,000, or so much thereof as may be required, is hereby appropriated for the foregoing purposes.

Mr. PAGE. In the committee amendment, on page 22, line 10, after the word "the," I move to strike out "2" and to insert in lieu thereof "3"; in line 11, after the comma, following the word "California," to insert the words "or Carquinez, Calif."; and in line 14, to strike out "October 1" and insert in lieu thereof "November 15." That is practically all one amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 23, after line 14, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to accept from King County, Wash., free from any encumbrances and conditions, without cost to the United States Government, a certain tract of land containing 250 acres, more or less, at Sand Point, for use as an aviation base.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 9, after "$200,000," to insert "joint Army and Navy water-supply system for Fort Kamehameha and Ford Island, $190,000," and, in line 11, after the words "in all," to strike out "$890,000" and insert "$1,080,000," so as to make the clause read:

Naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii: Electric connections to dry dock, $15,000; central power plant extensions, $200,000; quay wall connecting dry dock and wharf, $330,000; machine shop, to continue, $100,000; electric-system extensions, $30,000; oxy-acetylene building, $15,000; marine railway, to complete, $200,000; joint Army and Navy water-supply system for Fort Kamehameha and Ford Island, $190,000; in all, $1,080,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 11, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to exchange a tract of land containing 81.7 acres, more or less, being a part of Puuloa Rifle Range Reservation, located at the entrance to Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, forming the northeasterly portion of said reservation, for an equal acreage of land free from encumbrances and located adjoining the northwesterly portion of said reservation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, after line 19, to insert:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to exchange certain land now a part of the naval station property at Honolulu, Hawaii, necessary for the extension of Punchbowl Street, city of Honolulu, through the naval station, for certain land now owned or to be acquired by the Territory of Hawaii, lying to the northeast of the naval station, Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, and containing 132 acres, more or less, required for naval purposes.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, after line 5, to insert:

Naval station, Olongapo, Philippine Islands: Pontoon for 20-ton floating derrick, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I submit an amendment, to come in on page 25, between lines 7 and 8, inserting a new paragraph.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 25, after line 7, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to construct a hospital building at Olongapo, P. I., at a cost not exceeding $75,000: Provided, That the proceeds derived from the sale of the U. S. S. Repose are hereby made available, in an amount not to exceed $75,000, for the construction of said building.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 25, line 16, after the word "fuel," to insert "Fuel-oil storage at Puget Sound, Wash., $1,050,000; fuel-oil storage at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, $1,000,000"; and in line 21, after the words "in all," to strike out "$85,000" and insert "$2,135,000," so as to make the clause read:

Depots for coal: For depots for coal and other fuel: Fuel-oil storage at Puget Sound, Wash., $1,050,000; fuel-oil storage at Pearl Harbor, Hawaii, $1,000,000; contingent, $50,000; care and custody of naval petroleum reserves, $10,000; water system at Yorktown, Va., $25,000; in all, $2,135,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 25, line 25, after "$10,000," to insert "which sum is hereby made immediately available for the control of malaria and mosquito breeding," so as to make the clause read:

Naval operating base, Hampton Roads, Va.: Hot-water returns to boiler house, $100,000; additional railroad track, $25,000; comfort stations, $36,000; sanitation, $10,000, which sum is hereby made immediately available for the control of malaria and mosquito breeding; in all, $171,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 26, after line 15, to insert:

Submarine base, San Pedro, Calif.: Toward the development of a submarine base, $500,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to accept from the city of Los Angeles, Calif., free from encumbrances, and without cost to the United States Government, a certain tract of land in the harbor of Los Angeles, Calif., for use as a site for a naval submarine base, and containing 223 acres, more or less.

Mr. PAGE. In the committee amendment on page 26, line 16, after the word "base," I move to strike out the words "San Pedro" and insert in lieu thereof the words "Los Angeles Harbor (San Pedro)." The amendment to the amendment is offered simply for the purpose of identifying San Pedro as a part of Los Angeles.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. Also, in the committee amendment, on page 26, line 20, after the word "encumbrances," I move to insert the words "and conditions"; and in line 23, after the word "containing," to strike out the remainder of the paragraph and in lieu thereof to insert "50 acres, more or less, of hard land and 173 acres, more or less, of submerged land."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 27, after line 10, to insert:

Submarine, destroyer, and aviation base, Port Angeles, Wash.: Toward the development of a submarine, destroyer, and aviation base, on land owned by the United States, $100,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 20, after the word "stations," to strike out "$3,000,000" and insert "$4,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

Repairs and preservation at navy yards: For repairs and preservation at navy yards, fuel depots, fuel plants, and stations, $4,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 27, line 21, after the word "works," to strike out "$10,070,950" and insert "$15,766,950," so as to make the clause read:

Total public works, $15,766,950, and the amounts herein appropriated therefor, except for repairs and preservation at navy yards and stations, shall be available until expended.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Supplies and Accounts," in the item of appropriation for pay of the Navy, on page 32, line 12, before the word "fails," to strike out "declines and," so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That retainer pay provided by existing law shall not be paid to any member of the Naval Reserve Force who fails to train as provided by law during the year for which he declines to train.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I offer an amendment to come in on page 32, after line 13. I send the amendment to the desk and ask the Secretary to read it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read as requested.

The READING CLERK. On page 32, after line 13, it is proposed to insert a new paragraph, as follows:

That hereafter, immediately upon official notification of the death from wounds or disease, not the result of his own misconduct, of any officer or enlisted man on the active list of the Regular Navy or Regular Marine Corps, or on the retired list when on active duty, the Paymaster

General of the Navy shall cause to be paid to the widow, and if there be no widow to the child or children, and if there be no widow or child to any other dependent relative of such officer or enlisted man previously designated by him, an amount equal to six months' pay at the rate received by such officer or enlisted man at the date of his death. The Secretary of the Navy shall establish regulations requiring each officer and enlisted man having no wife or child to designate the proper dependent relative to whom this amount shall be paid in case of his death. Said amount shall be paid from funds appropriated for the pay of the Navy and Marine Corps: Provided, That nothing in this section or in other existing legislation shall be construed as making the provisions of this section applicable to officers or enlisted men of any forces of the Navy of the United States other than those of the Regular Navy and Marine Corps, and nothing in this section shall be construed to apply in commissioned grades to any officers except those holding permanent or provisional appointments in the Regular Navy or Marine Corps.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 33, line 6, after the word "service," to insert "expenses in handling provisions," so as to make the clause read:

Provisions, Navy: For provisions and commuted rations for the seamen and marines, which commuted rations may be paid to caterers of messes, in case of death or desertion, upon orders of the commanding officers, commuted rations for officers on sea duty (other than commissioned officers of the line, Medical and Supply Corps, chaplains, chief boatswains, chief gunners, chief carpenters, chief machinists, chief pay clerks, and chief sailmakers) at 68 cents per diem, and midshipmen at $1.08 per diem, and commuted rations stopped on account of sick in hospital and credited at the rate of 68 cents per ration to the naval hospital fund; subsistence of officers and men unavoidably detained or absent from vessels to which attached under orders (during which subsistence rations to be stopped on board ship and no credit for commutation therefor to be given); subsistence of men on detached duty; subsistence of officers and men of the naval auxiliary service; subsistence of members of the Naval Reserve Force during period of active service; expenses in handling provisions and for subsistence of female nurses and Navy and Marine Corps general courts-martial prisoners undergoing imprisonment with sentences of dishonorable discharge from the service at the expiration of such confinement: Provided, That the Secretary of the Navy is authorized to commute rations for such general courts-martial prisoners in such amounts as seem to him proper, which may vary in accordance with the location of the naval prison, but which shall in no case exceed 30 cents per diem for each ration so commuted; and for the purchase of United States Army emergency rations as required; in all, $26,000,000, to be available until the close of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1922.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 35, line 1, after the word "inspection," to strike out "storemen, store labor"; in line 5, after "$3,500,000," to insert "Provided further, That not to exceed $95,000 from 'Proceeds of sales' may be used for necessary employees in the Navy Department in connection with salvage and disposition of excess stocks"; and in line 8, after the words "in all," to strike out "$10,500,000" and insert "$12,500,000," so as to make the clause read:

Maintenance, Bureau of Supplies and Accounts: For fuel; the removal and transportation of ashes and garbage from ships of war; books, blanks, and stationery, including stationery for commanding and navigating officers of ships, chaplains on shore and afloat, and for the use of courts-martial on board ships; purchase, repair, and exchange of typewriters for ships; packing boxes and materials; interior fittings for general storehouses, pay offices, and accounting offices in navy yards; expenses of disbursing officers; coffee mills and repair thereto; expenses of naval clothing factory and machinery for the same; laboratory equipment; purchase of articles of equipage at home and abroad under the cognizance of the Bureau of Supplies and Accounts, and for the payment of labor in equipping vessels therewith, and the manufacture of such articles in the several navy yards; musical instruments and music; mess outfits; soap on board naval vessels; athletic outfits; tolls, ferriages, yeomen's stores, safes, and other incidental expenses; labor in general storehouses, paymasters' offices, and accounting offices in navy yards and naval stations, including naval stations maintained in island possessions under the control of the United States, and expenses in handling stores purchased and manufactured under "General account of advances," and the accounting officers of the Treasury are authorized and directed to credit "General account of advances" with the amount of the net losses which may be certified by the Paymaster General of the Navy as having been incurred in disposing of excess stocks in the naval supply account; and reimbursement to appropriations of the Department of Agriculture of cost of inspection of meats and meat food products for the Navy Department: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for chemists and for clerical, inspection, and messenger service in the supply and accounting departments of the navy yards and naval stations and disbursing offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $3,500,000: Provided further, That not to exceed $95,000 from "Proceeds of sales" may be used for necessary employees in the Navy Department in connection with salvage and disposition of excess stocks; in all, $12,500,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 6, after the word "therewith," to insert "including necessary technical and clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, not to exceed $75,000," so as to make the clause read:

Fuel and transportation: Coal and other fuel for steamers' and ships' use, including expenses of transportation, storage, and handling the same; maintenance and general operation of machinery of naval fuel depots and fuel plants; water for all purposes on board naval vessels; and ice for the cooling of water, including the expense of transportation and storage of both, $10,000,000: Provided, That the United States Shipping Board shall not require payment from the Navy Department for the charter hire of vessels furnished or to be furnished from July 1, 1918, to June 30, 1921, inclusive, for the use of that department when such vessels are owned by the United States Government: Provided further, That $1,000,000 of this appropriation shall be available for use, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, in mining coal or contracting for the same in Alaska, the transportation of the same, and the construction of coal bunkers and the necessary docks for use in supplying ships therewith, including necessary technical and clerical assistance in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, not to exceed $75,000; and the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to select from the public coal lands in Alaska such areas as may be necessary for use by him for the purposes stated herein.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Construction and Repair," in the item of appropriation for construction and repair of vessels, on page 37, line 19, after the word "vessels," to strike out "$30,000,000" and insert "$31,000,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Bureau of Steam Engineering," on page 39, line 12, after the word "service," to insert "including the purchase of land as necessary for radio shore stations"; on page 40, line 6, after the word "exceed," to strike out "$2,250,000" and insert "$2,500,000"; and in line 7, after the word "engineering," to strike out "$28,000,000" and insert "$29,050,000, so as to make the clause read:

Engineering: For repairs, preservation, and renewal of machinery, auxiliary machinery, and boilers of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats, distilling and refrigerating apparatus; repairs, preservation, and renewals of electric interior and exterior signal communications and all electrical appliances of whatsoever nature on board naval vessels, except range finders, battle order and range transmitters and indicators, and motors and their controlling apparatus used to operate machinery belonging to other bureaus; searchlights and fire-control equipments for antiaircraft defense at shore stations; maintenance and operation of coast-signal service, including the purchase of land as necessary for radio shore stations; equipage, supplies, and materials under the cognizance of the bureau required for the maintenance and operation of naval vessels, yard craft, and ships' boats; purchase, installation, repair, and preservation of machinery, tools, and appliances in navy yards and stations, pay of classified force under the bureau; incidental expenses for naval vessels, navy yards, and stations, inspectors' offices, the engineering experiment station, such as photographing, technical books and periodicals, stationery, and instruments; instruments and apparatus, supplies, and technical books and periodicals necessary to carry on experimental and research work in radiotelegraphy at the naval radio laboratory: Provided, That the sum to be paid out of this appropriation, under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for clerical, drafting, inspection, and messenger service in navy yards, naval stations, and offices of United States inspectors of machinery and engineering material for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, shall not exceed $2,500,000, in all, engineering $29,050,000, and the Bureau of Steam Engineering hereafter shall be designated the "Bureau of Engineering."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was continued to line 20, page 40, the last paragraph read being as follows:

NAVAL ACADEMY.

Pay, Naval Academy: Pay of professors and others, Naval Academy: Pay of professors and instructors, including one professor as librarian, $275,000.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, on page 40, line 20, after the word "librarian," I move to strike out "$275,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$385,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed. The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the head of "Marine Corps," on page 45, after line 18, to strike out:

The number of enlisted men in the Marine Corps appropriated for by this act is authorized at 27,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 45, after line 21, to insert:

The authorized enlisted strength of the active list of the Marine Corps is hereby permanently established at 27,400, distribution in the various grades to be made in the same proportion as provided under existing law.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 46, after line 2, I move the amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 46, line 2, after the word "law" and before the period, it is proposed to insert a colon and the following proviso:

Provided, That all officers serving temporarily in the grades of captain and below upon the date of the passage of this act shall be eligible to fill existing vacancies and those hereby created in the permanent authorized strength in said grades by transfer to or reappointment in the permanent Marine Corps in the grades not above that of captain. Transfers so made shall be without regard to age, and if found not qualified for transfer to the same grade as that held by them on the date of transfer then to lower grades after qualification. All officers so transferred shall establish to the satisfaction of the Secretary of the Navy, under such rules as he may prescribe, their mental, moral, professional, and physical qualifications to perform the duties of the grade to which transferred or reappointed and shall take precedence with each other and with other officers of the Marine Corps in such order as may be recommended by a board of marine officers and approved by the Secretary of the Navy: Provided, That all persons who served honorably as officers in the Marine Corps or Marine Corps Reserve on active duty at any time between April 6, 1917, and the date of the passage of this act and who have been honorably discharged or assigned to inactive duty shall be eligible for permanent appointment in the same or a lower rank than that held on discharge or assignment to inactive duty, but not above the rank of captain, to fill vacancies existing or hereby created in the permanent authorized strength of the Marine Corps under the same conditions as those above prescribed for officers now in the service: Provided further, That all transfers and appointments made in accordance with the provisions of this section shall be accomplished by June 30, 1921.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, under the head of "Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department," subhead "Marine Corps," in the item of appropriation for "Contingent, Marine Corps," on page 52, line 19, after "$2,740,322," to insert "Provided, That not to exceed $318,000 of the unexpended balance on June 30, 1920, of the appropriation 'Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps,' contained in the naval appropriation act for 1920, approved July 11, 1919, is reappropriated and made immediately available until used, for replacing the present wooden-stave water pipe with cast-iron pipe at the marine barracks, Quantico, Va.," so as to read:

For the construction, operation, and maintenance of laundries; and for all emergencies and extraordinary expenses arising at home and abroad, but impossible to anticipate or classify, $2,740,322: Provided, That not to exceed $318,000 of the unexpended balance on June 30, 1920, of the appropriation "Maintenance, Quartermaster's Department, Marine Corps," contained in the naval appropriation act for 1920, approved July 11, 1919, is reappropriated and made immediately available until used, for replacing the present wooden-stave water pipe with cast-iron pipe at the marine barracks, Quantico, Va.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Increase of the Navy," on page 53, line 16, after the word "expended," to strike out "$48,000,000" and insert "$52,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

Increase of the Navy, construction and machinery: On account of hulls and outfits of vessels and machinery of vessels heretofore authorized, to be available until expended, $52,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, after line 16, to insert:

On account of completion and fitting out of seven type "B" vessels as aviation and destroyer tenders, to be available until expended, $11,700,000: Provided, That these vessels shall be completed at the Hog Island plant of the United States Shipping Board Emergency Fleet Corporation, from fabricated material now on hand at that plant, and that for the fabrication of these vessels and for their completion up to the point when, in common agreement between the chairman of the Shipping Board and the Secretary of the Navy, these vessels are far enough advanced in their construction to be taken over and completed by the Secretary of the Navy as he may direct, and for this purpose the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation is authorized to continue the Hog Island plant in operation.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 12, after the word "authorized," to strike out "$104,000,000" and insert "$108,000,000," so as to make the clause read:

Total increase of the Navy heretofore authorized, $108,000,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. After line 17, on page 54, I move to insert the following:

Hospital ship No. 1, from $3,250,000 to $4,355,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Naval Affairs was, on page 54, line 21, after the word "Submarine," to inclose the letter "S" in brackets.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 23, after the word "Submarines," to inclose the letter "R" in brackets.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was concluded.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I have two amendments that I should like to suggest as coming from the committee.

On page 3, line 7, after the word "instruction," the words "at home and" should be in italics. This is simply a clerical error, and the change is made so that it will appear properly on the books of the Secretary.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 3, line 7, after the word "instruction," the words "at home and" should appear in italics as a committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 9, after line 4, I move the insertion of an amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 9, after line 4, it is proposed to insert the following:

The Bureau of Navigation, Navy Department, is hereby directed to furnish to the proper officers in the several States, Territories, insular possessions, and the District of Columbia of the United States, statements of the services of all persons from those several places who entered the naval service during the war with Germany, and for that purpose a sum not to exceed $300,000 is hereby appropriated for obtaining the necessary material and the employment of the necessary clerical force.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 9, lines 7 and 8, I move to strike out, commencing on line 7, the words "and for such other purposes of like character as the Secretary of the Navy may deem advisable."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 9, line 10, after the word "than," I move to strike out "one person" and insert "five persons."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 17, line 19, the words "freight and" are printed in roman, and they should be in italics. I move that the change be made in order to constitute a committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The READING CLERK. On page 17, line 19, after the words "motor-propelled," it is proposed to insert the words "freight and."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 26, between lines 6 and 7, I move to insert:

Naval Hospital, Las Animas, Colo.: Railroad connection with Arkansas Valley Railroad, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 32, after the word "he," in line 13, I move to strike out the word "declines" and in lieu thereof to insert the word "fails."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. On page 47, line 12, after the word "posts," I move to strike out "$100,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$145,852."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, the Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] desired me to call for a quorum when we got through with the bill. I understand that there is a committee amendment passed over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is.

Mr. JONES of Washington. The Senator from Utah wished to be heard on that amendment.

Mr. LODGE. There is an amendment passed over. There is another one that the committee is not yet ready to go on with. So I should think it would be better to adjourn until to-morrow.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I will not make the point of no quorum if an adjournment is to be taken. The Senator just asked that I do it——

Mr. LODGE. Of course, we can consider any individual amendments which may be offered.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I think that amendment is all the Senator from Utah is interested in.

Mr. LODGE. That is all; I know that.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, I submit the following amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The READING CLERK. On page 32, under "Pay of the Navy," following line 13, insert the following:

Hereafter any officer or enlisted man on the retired list may, on his own application, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy, be ordered to active duty, and while employed on active duty shall receive the full pay and allowances of his rank or rating.

Mr. CALDER. Mr. President, that puts a retired officer who is in the service at this time exactly on the same footing that he is on in war time. In peace time, when a retired officer comes back to the service, he receives no pay or allowances higher than the pay and allowances given to a lieutenant commander, even if he is an admiral. It seems to me to be just that a man who comes back in peace time should receive the compensation of his rank.

Mr. PAGE. Mr. President, I feel constrained to raise a point of order on that amendment, as much as I dislike to do so.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair overrules the point of order.

The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will report the first amendment passed over.

The READING CLERK. The first amendment passed over is, on page 5, line 6, in the item for an investigation of fuel oil and other fuel.

Mr. LODGE. I hope that amendment will not be taken up to-night. There is another amendment which also must be completed before we pass the bill. That can not be done to-night.

So, unless the chairman of the committee has other amendments to offer, I shall move to adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. I believe that every matter has been attended to except one or two which it has been agreed may go over for further consideration.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 3 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Wednesday, April 28, 1920, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, April 27, 1920.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon, and was called to order by Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas as Speaker pro tempore.

The Chaplain, Rev. Henry N. Couden, D. D., offered the following prayer:

We thank Thee, our Father in heaven, that Thou didst create man a progressive being and didst place within his reach the means and opportunities for the betterment of life and its conditions.

It is a far reach from savagery to civilization, but man has proved himself worthy of the trust bestowed upon him. Yet we realize that perfection is still far away but the ideals are beckoning on.

The room for improvement, it is said, is the largest room in the world; but the light is dawning. The longings, hopes, and aspirations within us are the spurs which move us onward and upward to the goal reached by the Master ages ago.

Under the inspiration of His life, example, and precepts, grant that we may push forward with undaunted hope and courage until we all come unto the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes in which to prefer a request for unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state his request.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, I desire to address the House either this afternoon or to-morrow, immediately after the regular order, upon the soldiers' compensation act, and I desire to do this for this purpose, if I may explain: I have been in consultation with the Treasury officials for some time and have prepared what I believe is an important and a very interesting proposition to place before the House. It includes tables which I think we all ought to have, whether we adopt the plan or not. There is no politics or partisanship in what I desire to say, and in view of the billion and a half dollars it is proposed to appropriate for the soldiers, I desire very much to present these facts to the House.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I understand the gentleman correctly, he proposes to discuss the method by which we shall raise this money?

Mr. FREAR. Practically so.

Mr. GARNER. To meet whatever legislation we pass. I shall not object, but I shall ask that this side of the House have 10 or 15 minutes in order to meet any suggestion——

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Why not take as much time as the gentleman from Wisconsin does?

Mr. GARNER. Then 30 minutes on this side of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, if I may be allowed, the Democratic side of the House has already had an hour and 10 minutes more than the Republican side in the discussion of these very matters.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The Democratic side of the House obtained the hour and a half in general debate upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. MONDELL. But the Democratic side of the House received an hour and 10 minutes more than the Republican side on the debate.

Mr. GARNER. But that was under general debate on a bill before the House in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. MONDELL. I understand that it was under general debate, but it was with a clear understanding of what was going to be discussed. I have no objection to it and was very glad to accede to it, but having done that it does not seem to me there should be undue quibbling now over a division of time.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. If the gentleman will yield, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GOOD] made a speech of an hour and a half, which was the first one that I know of that was made on this subject, so that if you are going to count the Rainey speech in this timekeeping business the Republicans are still 40 minutes ahead.

Mr. MONDELL. We had no advantage in the time. At the time Mr. GOOD made his speech the time was evenly divided, and the Rainey speech, with the 10 minutes additional that were allotted to him, was extra time without a division upon this side and without any corresponding time on this side.

Mr. GARNER. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois demands the regular order.

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. MADDEN. But the gentleman can not cut me off with a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARD. I desire to know whether the gentleman from Wisconsin makes his request to speak this afternoon or to-morrow?

Mr. FREAR. This afternoon, preferably, or to-morrow, if that is the wish of the leaders on either side of the House.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Which one does the gentleman want?

Mr. FREAR. I asked this for this afternoon.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection if the gentleman desires to make it this afternoon.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the special order to-day he may be permitted to address the House—for how long?

Mr. FREAR. For half an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Thirty minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] may control 30 minutes for the purpose of discussing the bonus.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] the gentleman from Missouri may control 30 minutes, to be disposed of as he sees fit. Is there objection?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I do not intend to object, might we not know from the chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means, or from the leader on the Democratic side of the House, just when this proposed legislation is coming up and how much debate there is going to be on the matter when it does come up? Some seven or eight Members have secured the privilege to speak on this proposition, and it is impossible for an ordinary Member, like myself, of course, to secure any time when there are so many distinguished Members seeking the opportunity to give information. I would like to know when the bill is coming up and whether or not there will be an opportunity to get two or three minutes when it does come up. I think we are entitled to know.

Mr. CRISP. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DYER. Yes.

Mr. CRISP. The gentleman addressed his inquiry to this side of the House as well as to the other. I am a member of the Committee on Ways and Means. The Democratic members are not permitted to meet with the majority members of that committee when making up this bonus legislation, so we do not know on this side of the House when it will come up.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I am making an inquiry, and I trust no one will ask for the regular order, and we may get some information on this, which certainly would be of benefit to all Members of the House. I will yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman from Georgia and other gentlemen on the Democratic side have been called in conference and have sat in conference. The objection, as I understand it, is because there are some Republican conferences around this House in which they have not been called in.

Mr. CRISP. I do not know of any very important conference. We have been called into committee to consider this cash bonus proposition, and we had a number of hearings on that.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. When the entire bill is ready the gentleman will be called into conference.

Mr. BLANTON. After it is cut and dried.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Just the same way I was called in before when the Democrats had the House.

Mr. DYER. Will not the gentleman from Wyoming state when this bill is to come up and how much discussion there will be, as far as he is able to inform us at this time?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely nothing definite and settled finally in regard to the matter. I think the proposition is that the matter will be called up on the 3d day of May, Monday, if there be no objection, and the matter should be discussed the legislative day.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do not think I have the floor.

Mr. DYER. Still reserving the right to object, I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. LONGWORTH. While I do not undertake to speak for the chairman of the committee, I think I can safely say to the gentleman we hope that the full committee may meet on Friday and discuss the bill, and then as speedily as possible thereafter we hope to bring it to the attention of the House.

Mr. GARNER. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question? The gentleman from Ohio and those who are acting with him hope to bring it up on Monday, the 3d of May, providing the insurgents do not show sufficient strength to cause them to change their plans?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be glad to state to the gentleman that so far as I am able to tell there is no such thing as insurgents on this side of the House. [Laughter on the Democratic side of the House.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. If this request is granted, can the speeches not made to-day come into to-morrow, Calendar Wednesday?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House should adjourn the special order would carry over until the next day on which they would be in order.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is the inquiry I made, whether they would be in order to-morrow.

Mr. MONDELL. These requests, I understand, are for the day.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not the way the request was made.

Mr. MONDELL. The special orders so far made have related to this legislative day.

Mr. MANN of Illinois. That is not the request submitted by the gentleman from Texas. I have no objection to it, but I desire to know whether——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Will the gentleman from Texas give attention?

Mr. GARNER. I beg the gentleman's pardon. Mr. Speaker, I merely wanted to reserve 30 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], because you can not tell the position of gentlemen——

Mr. MANN of Illinois. I am not making objection to it, but making an inquiry whether it would go over until to-morrow if it is not reached to-day?

Mr. GARNER. I refer that to the gentleman from Missouri, whether he wants to use it to-day or——

Mr. MONDELL. But I understand these requests all relate to this legislative day.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. How much time has been promised?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Three hours and ten minutes.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. We have plenty of time to take it up to-day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas that at the conclusion of the remarks of the gentleman from Wisconsin the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] shall have 30 minutes? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that on Thursday after the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table I be allowed to address the House for 30 minutes on the subject of adjusted compensation of soldiers and the method that shall be used to secure money to pay the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] asks unanimous consent that at the conclusion of the reading of the Journal and disposition of matters on the Speaker's table on Thursday that he be permitted to address the House for 30 minutes on the adjustment of soldiers' pay. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, it is planned to bring in on Thursday a rule for the consideration of the bill for the retirement of civil-service employees. We should have the entire day for the discussion of that matter. It would take that time, I am sure, and I do not believe it would be wise to have any special provision for speeches on that day, and I shall have to object.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Speaker, I trust the gentleman will not object——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is heard.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Dudley, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had passed with amendments the bill (H. R. 11892) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution:

Senate resolution 353.

Resolved, That the Senate has heard with profound sorrow the announcement of the death of Hon. CHARLES A. NICHOLS, late a Representative from the State of Michigan.

Resolved, That a committee of six Senators be appointed by the Presiding Officer to join the committee appointed by the House of Representatives to take order for the superintending of the funeral of Mr. NICHOLS at Detroit, Mich.

Resolved, That the Secretary communicate a copy of these resolutions to the House of Representatives.

Resolved, That as a further mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the Senate do now adjourn.

And that under the second resolution the Presiding Officer had appointed Mr. TOWNSEND, Mr. NEWBERRY, Mr. FERNALD, Mr. ASHURST, Mr. HARRISON, and Mr. KEYES as said committee on the part of the Senate.

EQUALIZATION OF THE RATES OF PENSIONS, ETC.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9369, for the purpose of moving to agree to the Senate amendments.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Reserving the right to object, will the gentleman withhold that a moment——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pensions to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. GARD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, is this the bill providing for an increase of Civil War pensions to soldiers and widows of soldiers?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It is.

Mr. GARD. I have no objection.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I will.

Mr. DYER. What increase do the Senate amendments provide?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The Senate amendments give the benefit of the provisions of the act to the surviving soldiers of the Mexican War, the Mexican War widows, and the widows of the War of 1812.

Mr. DYER. And it does not make any increase in the bill as the House passed it?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER]?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, does my colleague have any objection to having the Senate amendments reported now?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. No.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. RAYBURN. Reserving the right to object, I did not have the bill before me, and I could not, therefore, understand what was meant by striking out "1915" and inserting "1905."

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Under the present law the limitation as to date of marriage, in order to give the widow a pensionable status, is June 27, 1905. Under the bill as it passed the House it was proposed to extend the time 10 years, or until June 27, 1915. The Senate has stricken out that provision and leaves the date as it is in the existing law, which is June 27, 1905.

Mr. RAYBURN. Under this bill, if a woman married a soldier in 1905 and he has since died, what is her pension under this Senate bill?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Thirty dollars, if she was married prior to June 27, 1905.

Mr. RAYBURN. Under this Senate bill. What was her pension under the House bill?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. There is no change except as to date.

Mr. RAYBURN. How much does this increase the bill as it passed the House? How much do the additions that the Senate has made increase the amount carried in the bill?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. In leaving the limitation as to date of marriage at June 27, 1905, it reduces the cost of the bill, of course, by the number of cases that would come in during those 10 years.

Mr. RAYBURN. I know; but the Senate materially increased the amount.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. It was stated in the debate in the Senate that the expense of the bill would be just about the same as when it came from the House, and that the added cost incurred by the addition of the Mexican soldiers, and the widows of Mexican soldiers, and of the War of 1812, would not amount to more than what the bill would be reduced by leaving the date of marriage as in the existing law. So the expense would be about the same, although, in my opinion, the expense of the bill for the first year would not be anything nearly as much as was estimated, because that estimate was made on the number on the roll on the 30th day of June last. It was then estimated that the cost of the bill would be about $65,000,000. Since that time the pension roll has been reduced, I think, by more than 50,000 pensioners who have died. In the last month, the month of March, of the soldiers and widows of the Civil War an average of 200 died each day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER]?

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object—and I certainly do not intend to object, because I know there is no Member of this House more pleased and rejoiced than I am that this bill is so near a law—I rise for the purpose first of congratulating the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER], the able chairman of the Invalid Pensions Committee, upon the very great honor that is about to become his, because I believe no greater honor has ever come to him or ever will come to him than to be the father of the most generous pension bill that Congress has ever passed. [Applause.] He is no fuller of joy than I am, and I congratulate him from the bottom of my heart in the name and in behalf of nearly a half million pensioners of the Civil War.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that I prize above every honor that has come to me the proud fact that the act of September 8, 1916, increasing the pensions of Civil War widows and extending the marriage limitations 15 years bears my name as its author. And so I measure well my words when I say no greater honor will ever come to the author of this splendid and generous bill. I am happy that I am a member of the committee with my gallant old colleague, Gen. SHERWOOD, and others which reported this bill, and for the opportunity it gave me to have some small part in securing the enactment of this bill into law. The beneficiaries of this bill will soon all be gone. They are near or beyond the fourscore and nearly all greatly in need of this increase in their pension to have the bare necessities of life. That a man who risked his life in the defense of his country or the good wife who cared for the old veteran during his declining days should want for food, clothing, and shelter is a disgrace to any nation. But I have no desire at this time to eulogize the soldier. I have done that many times in the past and this House and the old veterans know my estimate of the man who shoulders the gun and bares his breast in the defense of the Stars and Stripes and liberty and freedom. I speak not alone of the Civil War soldier but of the soldier of all wars.

I wish briefly, Mr. Speaker, to explain some of the provisions of this bill, believing that it will be helpful. Section 1 provides that every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and who was honorably discharged, or who served less than 90 days and was discharged for disability incurred in the service, and any person who served 60 days or more in the War with Mexico and who received an honorable discharge shall be entitled to $50 per month. All such whose names are now on the pension rolls under existing law or by special act of Congress will be increased automatically and no application will be required.

Section 2 provides an increase to $72 per month for all those who have title under section 1, who are now or who may become by reason of age and physical or mental weakness helpless or blind or so nearly so as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person. Proper evidence will be required from all who believe they are entitled to the $72 per month pension before it will be granted, but the $50 per month will be promptly allowed without evidence or application from those now on the roll.

Section 3 relates to those who in the line of duty lost a hand or foot or limb, and is intended to care for the maimed soldiers. The rating is $60, $65, $72, and $90, according to the disability. The number of soldiers benefited by this act are so few that I will not go into greater detail.

Section 4 provides that the widow of any person who may have had title under section 1, or who died in the service, who was married to such person prior to June 27, 1905, shall be entitled to a pension of $30 per month, which is an increase of $5. I regret very much that the Senate cut out of the House bill the extension of 10 years in the marriage limitations and restored it to the limit fixed in the Ashbrook law. And but for the fact that it is now nearly four months since the House passed this bill, and more than 20,000 beneficiaries have died while the bill was held up in the Senate, I would insist that the bill be sent to conference and an effort made to restore the date to June 27, 1915. Rather than risk another long delay, the committee thought best to accept the bill as it came from the Senate.

Section 5 gives Army nurses a pension of $30 per month, the same as soldiers' widows.

Section 6 undertakes to cure the defect in the Ashbrook law and give a pension to a widow who contracted more than one marriage, providing, of course, each marriage was dissolved by death or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife. Many claims were allowed to widows who had contracted more than one marriage before this ruling was made, which I have always contended was unwarranted and unfair, and certainly in conflict with the intent of Congress. It is to be hoped, however, the law is clear at last.

The Senate amended the House bill to include Mexican War soldiers and widows and dependents and also of the War of 1812. But very few are on the rolls of these wars. It is to be regretted that the Spanish War soldiers were not also included in this bill. In my judgment the Spanish War veterans have been treated very inconsiderately, and it is to be hoped the Sells bill, which passed the House on March 1, will become a law before Congress adjourns.

I have referred briefly to the main features of this bill and, I hope, made plain its provisions. I know that the Commissioner of Pensions, Gaylord M. Saltzgaber, who is a veteran of the Civil War and the most popular commissioner ever in that office, will expedite the increases just as rapidly as possible, and that many, if not all, who are paid on June 4 will get their increase then. It is a regrettable fact that the passage of this bill has been so long delayed. If I had had my way about it, the bill would have been a law long ago.

Mr. Speaker, I have been criticized some, both here and at home, because I have given so much of my time to pension legislation. Perhaps I have, and yet I have always felt that it was as little as I could do to do all that I can for those who saved the Union and fought for the preservation of our rights and liberty. I include all soldiers of all wars when I make this statement. I feel that I have only done by plain duty as I see it in looking well after those who in times of need looked well after us and our great Nation. And may I say that in doing so I have found the greatest pleasure in my service here. Nowhere have I ever found such gratitude and appreciation as in the hearts of these old soldiers and their widows. May I quote a line from two letters in my mail this morning? In one letter the faithful wife of an old soldier writes:

> Mr. B. is lying at the point of death and can live but a few days. He has begged me to write you and to thank you for being so good to him, and says God bless you and good-by.

In another letter a son writes:

> My mother died on April 7. A short time before she passed away she was talking to herself, and I asked her what she was talking about. She said, "I am talking to ASHBROOK about my pension. Thank him for me."

To have the confidence, esteem, and love of the tens of thousands of old soldiers and soldiers' widows who have appealed to me and to be conscious of the fact that I have tried to do all that I could to brighten their last days is rich reward for all that I have been able to do for them. If ever I get a crown and there are any stars in it, it will be due largely to the prayers of these good old souls, who are falling by the thousands, like autumn leaves, and who are surely entitled to the most generous consideration of a grateful people and Nation.

In conclusion I wish to append to my remarks the bill which becomes a law in 10 days if not sooner signed by the President. The bill is, to wit:

An act (H. R. 9369) to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War, to certain widows, former widows, dependent parents and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases.

Be it enacted, etc., That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, or is now upon the pension rolls as a Civil War veteran, and every person who served 60 days or more in the War with Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, during the war with that nation, and was honorably discharged therefrom, and who is now in receipt of, or entitled to receive under existing law, a pension of less than $50 per month, shall, from and after the passage of this act, be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $50 per month.

SEC. 2. That every person who served 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War, and who has been honorably discharged therefrom, or who, having so served less than 90 days, was discharged for a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, or is now upon the pension rolls as a Civil War veteran, and every person who served 60 days or more in the War with Mexico, or on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, during the war with that nation, and was honorably discharged therefrom, and who is now, or hereafter may become, by reason of age and physical or mental disabilities, helpless or blind, or so nearly helpless or blind as to require the regular personal aid and attendance of another person, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $72 per month.

SEC. 3. That from and after the approval of this act all persons whose names are on the pension roll, and who, while in the service of the United States in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps during the Civil War, and in the line of duty, shall have lost one hand or one foot or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $60 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at or above the elbow, or a leg at or above the knee, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $65 per month; that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost an arm at the shoulder joint or a leg at the hip joint, or so near the shoulder or hip joint, or where the same is in such condition as to prevent the use of an artificial limb, shall receive a pension at the rate of $72 per month; and that all persons who, in such service and in like manner, shall have lost one hand and one foot, or been totally disabled in the same, shall receive a pension at the rate of $90 per month.

SEC. 4. That the widow of any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War for 90 days or more, and was honorably discharged from such service, or regardless of the length of service was discharged for or died in service of a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having been married to such soldier, sailor, or marine prior to the 27th day of June, A. D. 1905, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month. And this section shall apply to a former widow of any person who served for 90 days or more in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States during the Civil War and was honorably discharged from such service, or who, having so served for less than 90 days was discharged for or died in service of a disability incurred in the service and in the line of duty, such widow having remarried, either once or more than once after the death of the soldier, sailor, or marine, if it be shown that such subsequent or successive marriage has, or have been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife; and any such former widow shall be entitled to and be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month; and any widow as mentioned in this section shall also be paid $6 per month for each child of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, and in case of the death or remarriage of the widow leaving a child or children of such officer or enlisted man under the age of 16 years, such pension shall be paid such child or children until the age of 16 years: Provided, That in case a minor child is insane, idiotic, or otherwise mentally or physically helpless, the pension shall continue during the life of such child, or during the period of such disability, and this proviso shall apply to all pensions heretofore granted or hereafter to be granted under this or any former statute: And provided further, That in case of any widow whose name has been dropped from the pension roll because of her remarriage, if the pension has been granted to an insane, idiotic, or otherwise helpless child, or to a child or children under the age of 16 years, she shall not be entitled to renewal of pension under this act until that pension to such child or children terminates, unless such child or children be a member or members of her family and cared for by her, and upon the renewal of pension to such widow, payment of pension to such child or children shall cease: And provided further, That the rate of pension for the widow of any person who served in the Army, Navy, or Marine Corps of the United States in the War of 1812, or for 60 days or more in the War with Mexico, on the coasts or frontier thereof, or en route thereto, during the war with that nation, and was honorably discharged therefrom, shall be $30 per month.

SEC. 5. That all Army nurses of the Civil War, and all dependent parents of any officer or enlisted man who served in the Civil War whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now entitled to pension under any existing law, shall be entitled to and shall be paid a pension at the rate of $30 per month.

SEC. 6. That the pension or increase of pension herein provided for, as to all persons whose names are now on the pension roll, or who are now in receipt of a pension under existing law, shall commence at the rates herein provided, from the date of the approval of this act, or under section 2 hereof, when the requisite condition is shown to exist after the approval of this act; and as to persons whose names are not now on the pension roll, or who are not now in receipt of a pension under existing law, but who may be entitled to pension under the provisions of this act, such pensions shall commence from the date of filing application therefor in the Bureau of Pensions in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, That as to any former widow as mentioned in section 4 hereof, who since the death of her soldier, sailor, or marine husband has remarried either once or more than once, and such subsequent or successive marriage has been dissolved, either by the death of the husband or husbands, or by divorce without fault on the part of the wife, and who filed her application for pension under the act of September 8, 1916, her pension shall commence from the date when her original application was filed under that act in the Bureau of Pensions, and shall be at the rate in that act provided, with increase at the rate or rates subsequently provided for the widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines, and by this act from the date or dates when any such subsequent act or acts took effect or may hereafter take effect, it being the intent and purpose to give to any such widow the same status as other widows of Civil War soldiers, sailors, and marines who have not remarried, and from the date of said act of September 8, 1916.

SEC. 7. That nothing in this act contained shall be held to affect or diminish the additional pension to those on the roll designated as "The Army and Navy medal of honor roll," as provided in the act of April 27, 1916, but any increase herein provided for shall be in addition thereto; and no pension heretofore granted under any act, public or private, shall be reduced by anything contained in this act.

SEC. 8. That no claim agent or attorney or other person shall be recognized in the adjustment of claims under this act, except in claims for original pension, and in such cases no more than the sum of $10 shall be allowed for services in preparing, presenting, or prosecuting any such claim, which sum shall be payable only on the order of the Commissioner of Pensions; and any person who shall violate any of the provisions of this section, or shall wrongfully withhold from the pensioner or claimant the whole or any part of a pension allowed or due to such pensioner or claimant under this act, shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof shall, for each and every offense, be fined not exceeding $500 or be imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both, in the discretion of the court.

Amend the title so as to read: "An act to revise and equalize rates of pension to certain soldiers, sailors, and marines of the Civil War and the War with Mexico, to certain widows, including widows of the War of 1812, former widows, dependent parents, and children of such soldiers, sailors, and marines, and to certain Army nurses, and granting pensions and increase of pensions in certain cases."

Mr. REAVIS. Mr. Speaker, I notice in one of the Senate amendments with reference to the veterans of the Mexican War, it states, "to those who served in Mexico and on the borders thereof." What was the necessity for that language?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is the language of the present law. The Senate simply incorporated the language of the present law. Originally, as I understand it, under the first bill that gave pensions to Mexican War soldiers, it was held by the Pension Bureau that they must have been actually in Mexico. Afterwards Congress amended that by adding these words "on the coasts or frontier thereof or en route thereto."

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, do I understand the gentleman from Illinois to state that this bill provides that the widows of the soldiers of the Civil War will receive hereafter pensions to the amount of $30 a month?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is the provision of the bill.

Mr. BLACK. Under the war-risk insurance bill, in the compensation section, if I recollect correctly, the widow receives $25 per month from the Government. What better right, I will ask the gentleman from Illinois, has the committee found to pension the Civil War widows at $30 a month than to pension the widows of the World War veterans at $25?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. That is very easy to answer.

Mr. BLACK. I would like to have an answer.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. The widows of the soldiers of the late war are young women and able to earn their living. The widows of the old Civil War veterans are now past being able to perform any labor by which they could earn a living. The committee took into consideration the age of the old soldiers and the old widows.

Mr. BLACK. Well, that might be a good reason, and it might not be. There are many of the widows of the World War veterans who might not be able to perform any labor. I do not think there should be any difference whatever. And I object to the unanimous agreement.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Why does the gentleman object?

Mr. BLACK. For the reason I said, that I do not think there ought to be any difference whatever in the pensions.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. But this bill has passed the House and the Senate, and the rate of a widow's pension is not affected by any Senate amendment. The rate is not now in controversy.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I will.

Mr. SMITH of Idaho. Under the administration of the proposed law, will it be necessary for the pensioners to make a formal application for the benefits of it?

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Not as to those who are on the roll. As to them the increase will be automatic.

Mr. Speaker, I move that the House agree to the amendments of the Senate.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, I have objected to the consideration of the conference report at this time.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. There is no conference report here. The bill is on the Speaker's table.

Mr. DYER. The bill is on the Speaker's table, and the gentleman moves to concur in the Senate amendments, which is perfectly in order.

Mr. BLACK. I make the point of order, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman's motion could not be in order at this time.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Well, Mr. Speaker, the bill is before the House. The Chair has laid the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent to take the bill from the Speaker's table was refused on the objection of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK].

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. But what would become of the bill? It is on the Speaker's table, and some disposition must be made of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It would be referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. I hope that will not be done. I do not see what the gentleman would accomplish by having that done. It would simply be reported back here with the recommendation that the amendments be concurred in. The provision to which the gentleman objects has passed both the House and the Senate.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, may I suggest to the gentleman that he let the matter go over until Thursday, and then perhaps the matter can be arranged without further friction or contest?

Mr. MANN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, may I get the attention of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLACK]? I voted against this bill when it passed the House, as the gentleman from Texas did. The question that the gentleman from Texas raises is not involved in the Senate amendments. If it were, I think it would be very proper for him to make an objection; but that is not involved in the Senate amendments.

Mr. BLACK. I will request that the gentleman let it go over until the morning. In the meantime I will look into the bill.

Mr. GARNER. Let it go over until Thursday.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be left on the Speaker's table without being referred.

Mr. GARNER. The Speaker can control that. Mr. Speaker, in order that the record may be kept straight, I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FULLER] ought to withdraw his request. The Speaker will control the bill, and, I imagine, keep it on the desk.

Mr. FULLER of Illinois. Very well. I will withdraw my request for the present, with the understanding that the bill remain on the Speaker's table until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois withdraws his motion for the present.

Under the special order heretofore entered, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

SOLDIERS' COMPENSATION ACT.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this is the day of the demagogue. The spirit of unrest is abroad in the land. The greatest war that the world has ever known has absorbed more capital and consumed more of the products of human labor than has been taken in the last 200 years before. This war has passed, but its debts still hang over us a gigantic and staggering burden. The waste of this great conflict has made material scarce, has reduced production, and sent the price of necessities soaring. Inevitably with this reaction hardships have followed and everyone desires to escape from these conditions. In these times it is easy to inflame the public mind and to make people believe that all of these hardships can be remedied by a redistribution of property. All sorts of quack remedies are proposed, the most common of which is to take, under the guise of taxation, property wherever it can be found if its possessor has more than the average of this world's goods, or in other words for the Government to confiscate whatever it needs. These doctrines have been tried before and are being tried now in Russia. They have always brought ruin to all classes and they always will.

Yet there are many that preach the doctrine of revolution, that say that our present form of government is wholly wrong, that our system of business ought to be overturned, that property ought to be no longer recognized, that no man should be allowed to enjoy the fruits of his toil which he had saved by economy, that even the wage earner should not be permitted to have a home of his own, but only a place to live which belonged to the Government. Mr. Speaker, the most dangerous man in these days is not the socialist, is not the Bolshevist, is not even the anarchist. The people of this country have too much good sense, are too well educated, too thoughtful, too industrious, to be deeply moved by the ranting of the outspoken revolutionist.

The most dangerous man in these days is one who, occupying a position more or less high in the council of this Government, and consequently speaking with some authority, instead of attempting to apply to the evils from which we suffer some sober thought and practical judgment which will enable us to lessen the burdens under which we labor, for the purpose of political advantage raises his voice to proclaim throughout the land perverted statements of our condition, which add to the fires of discontent, inflame class against class, fan the smoldering embers of revolution, and in the end threaten the very existence of the institutions upon which this Nation was founded. [Applause.]

If the gentleman from Illinois who indulged in this kind of talk in his speech of last week had deliberately intended to revolutionize this Government, the language of his speech could not have been better calculated. With others following his example, he may yet see the time when the torch will be applied to his own stately mansion and ruin spread over its broad acres, with its luxurious deer park, to the same extent as now exists in those countries where anarchy prevails.

Mr. Speaker, I have not often made political speeches in this House. I have never indulged in personalities, except when they were in the first instance directed toward myself. Under no circumstances have I ever in any of my previous remarks in this House impugned the good faith, the honesty, or integrity of any Member. But the gentleman from Illinois has seen fit to make charges and insinuation which, if well founded, would lead the public to believe that the great body of the Republican Members of this House were little better than a gang of thieves seeking to loot the masses of the people in the interest of the multimillionaires, and that the arch conspirators among them were the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, including myself, while he posed as a friend of the soldiers, and one who proposed to satisfy their claims by taxing only those who had still in their hands enormous fortunes made out of the war.

But, Mr. Speaker, never did a man so overreach himself and fall so far into the pit which he himself had dug to entrap as did the gentleman from Illinois. In his attempt to formulate charges against the Republican Members of the House and the members of the Ways and Means Committee, he in fact constructed merely a damning indictment against his own party and against himself. The substance of his accusation is that while the European war prevailed, and particularly while we were engaged in it, an enormous amount of high profits accumulated in the hands of war profiteers from which the Government failed to obtain for its support its proper share. To support this charge he asserted we developed in this country 23,000 millionaires during the period of the war, that there were 69,000 men whose income during the war years was $3,000,000,000 more than it was in the three prewar years, and that during the war years the corporations of this country made $3,800,000,000 more than they did in the same number of prewar years.

If these charges are true, and if those who made these enormous sums were not fairly taxed, whose fault was it? I assert beyond all possibility of controversy that it was not the fault of the Republican Party nor of the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee, nor, in particular, of myself; for I have always voted for the highest taxation proposed upon the swollen fortunes of multimillionaires. What party, in fact, was in power during all of these years? Does not everyone know that it was the Democratic Party? Does not everyone know that during these years the administration formulated plans of taxation and presented them to a Congress controlled by the Democratic Party and a Ways and Means Committee upon which there then were two Democrats to one Republican? On this Ways and Means Committee the gentleman from Illinois, as a prominent and influential member, sat with a Treasury expert in attendance to tell him just exactly how much these laws would take out of the profits which he now talks about.

Did he claim, then, that these taxes were not high enough? Oh, no. I remember quite well when the last revenue bill came back from conference with the Senate, in which, in accordance with the recommendation of a Democratic President and a Democratic Secretary of the Treasury, its tax provisions had been greatly reduced. What was the gentleman's record then and what did he favor in the speech he then made? To increase the taxes on big incomes? No; he wanted to lower exemptions and would take more from those whose incomes were so small that they were not taxed under the bill. Did he approve of a higher excess-profits tax rate upon the corporations? No; he wanted to abolish all such taxes upon business no matter how extortionate the profits of any business might be. Was he objecting to a sales tax then? No; the sales tax which he now so vigorously denounces, even a turnover sales tax, which will not be carried in the bill under discussion, met the approval of the gentleman at that time. He did not have a word of objection against the bill because it left too much in the hands of the profiteers. On the contrary, at that time if he had had his way they would have been left more. Yet if it left them too much, he knew it just as well then as he knows it now. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman from Illinois was honest and fair then is he honest and fair now; or, if he is honest and fair now, in Heaven's name what was he then when he deliberately permitted these profiteers to escape? [Applause on the Republican side.]

But this is not all. The gentleman from Illinois, possessing all of this information along with the other Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee, went out to the country during the war and told the people that the Government had raised all the money by taxation of incomes and excess profits that it could without injuring business, and he, with the others who must have known these facts if they existed, asked the people to make sacrifices in order to subscribe for Liberty bonds. Yet he now says, in effect, that the necessity of purchasing these Liberty bonds arose from the fact that he and his party had permitted great profiteers to escape from taxation. Was he telling the truth then; if so, did he tell it in his speech of last Thursday?

I assume that the gentleman has an intelligent constituency. If he should go out on the stump this fall and repeat these charges that the profiteers had escaped taxation during the war under a Democratic administration, and should ask his audience who was responsible therefor, they would point at the gentleman from Illinois and say: "You and your party." [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, let us see how the gentleman from Illinois has exemplified his friendship for the soldier and his desire to support this bonus legislation, which, when the hearings thereon opened, all his remarks would indicate he in fact opposed. He has presented a bill to go back five years and take for each year 50 per cent of the income of those whom he calls war profiteers. I can readily see how a person who has not made a special study of the problems of taxation, which never were so difficult as in these days when taxes are mounting so high, can at first blush look upon the gentleman's plan as a plausible one. But how anyone who has made a study of taxation, and especially one who claims, like the gentleman from Illinois, to have made some study of political economy, can in good faith advocate any such proposition is more than I can understand. I propose to tear the mask from this bill, turn the light upon it, and show it for the sham and fraud that it is, for it is not a bill which will seriously tax the multimillionaire, but it is a bill that will bankrupt thousands of men of moderate incomes, and would in any event produce but a small part of the money necessary to adjust the compensation of the soldiers of the late war. How does the gentleman arrive at the comparisons he makes, and how does he determine who is a war profiteer? He says that the term "war profiteer" or "war beneficiary," as used in his bill, means any person who during any of the years 1915 to 1919, inclusive, had an income of over $20,000, and who made more than he did in the year 1914. But why does he take the year 1914? Nineteen hundred and fourteen is a year of unhappy memories. Nineteen hundred and fourteen is the year in which Democratic policies were applied to normal times, with the inevitable result of stagnation in business everywhere and utter prostration for the most part. [Applause on the Republican side.] Nineteen hundred and fourteen was a year in which the farmers of the West sold in the spring and summer their wheat at from 60 cents to 65 cents a bushel. In the iron and steel trade alone, in June of 1914, there were a million men out of employment, and in the country at large from 3,000,000 to 5,000,000. In the first six months of 1914, 5,300 business houses failed with a staggering total of $135,000,000 in liabilities, exceeding by more than $50,000,000 that of any other period in our history.

Prices of farm products rose when the war broke out in August, but business in the East, as a rule, suffered only the more greatly, for the recovery did not come until the next year. Thousands upon thousands of individuals, firms, and corporations never made a dollar in 1914, and yet the gentleman from Illinois proposes to tax them for the crime of not having made money under a Democratic administration in normal times. And who, in fact, would his proposition strike hardest? Not the Rockefellers or the Morgans, not the great bankers or the great speculators. These men had already paid a tax of over 70 per cent, and a tax of over 30 per cent upon them would not only be unconstitutional as to them in going beyond the income and taking property itself, but would probably make the bill unconstitutional as to all. On the other hand, if the bill could be applied at all, it would reach the man with a moderate income from 1915 to 1919, who was unable to make anything in 1914 by reason of the application of Democratic principles and now would be called upon to pay 50 per cent of this income for each of five years in addition to the taxes he has already paid, or 250 per cent of an average income for a single year. Could a more preposterous scheme possibly have been invented? Since 1914 there has been a great increase in the smaller incomes. Some of them are five or six times as large as they were in 1914. The big incomes have not increased so rapidly. On the contrary, since 1917, they have fallen off. Nineteen hundred and seventeen is the only year that would take anything from the big incomes under the gentleman's plan. Perhaps he intends to levy taxes on taxes. It would be no more absurd than the rest of his plan. The gentleman says that 23,000 new millionaires were made by the war. The only way that anyone can tell anything about how many millionaires there are in the country is by the income-tax returns. Assuming that the millionaire makes 5 per cent on his money, there are only about 20,000 millionaires in the country now, and if these millionaires have been making a higher percentage, as the gentleman seems to claim—and I am talking about the percentage before their taxes are taken out—then there would not be even 20,000 of them, according to the income-tax returns. He talks about $3,000,000,000 profits made by the corporations during the war in excess of the prewar years. How fair the gentleman is in this comparison also and his talk about the amount that 69,000 people made, you can judge when I tell you that these figures are made up without deducting the taxes paid by these parties.

I do not say that all of these parties were taxed enough. I only say that the gentleman's figures amount to nothing, show nothing, and are worth nothing except to deceive the uninformed, because they are made up without deducting the taxes paid. For 1918 alone we took from the corporations $3,275,000,000 in taxes and in the three years of 1917, 1918, and 1919 over $7,000,000,000 in taxes. Now, if anyone could figure out what they had left would it mean anything, because a great corporation might have many millions of dollars left and yet not make 4 per cent on its capital? The railways of the country made over a billion of dollars in these three years and yet were unable to pay an average of 5 per cent in dividends. It is only the profit that each individual corporation had left that tells the story of whether there were any of them that ought to have paid more taxes. Did the corporations have more left after paying taxes in these years than they had in 1915, which was a year when we were not engaged in war? They did not. Did the individual taxpayers in high incomes have as much after deducting their taxes in 1919 as they had in 1915? They did not. They did not have as much as they had in 1914, as I shall show by a table prepared by a Treasury expert, and yet the gentleman claims that he is going to raise by his bill the money to pay added compensation to the soldiers by added taxes on the big incomes. If when we took 80 per cent of the profits of corporations which had been making more than before we got into the war and, in addition, if they had war contracts, took 10 per cent of the profits on them, and then after their dividends had got into the hands of the individual taxpayer took from the men having great incomes up to 77 per cent more—if this was not high enough, why did not the gentleman raise his voice in complaint against these rates? Whatever these men and these corporations made under a system of taxation which the gentleman helped to frame, but now declares to be unjust, is water gone over the dam, and the Republican Party and no other party can go back for five years and gather it up. Some of these men are dead, some spent all their incomes after taxes had been paid as they went along, others have it in investments where it could not be withdrawn, and the gentleman now prepares a bill which would call upon them to pay anywhere from 100 to 250 per cent from what they would receive as income in a single year. No country has undertaken any such proposition.

The English statesmen examined into it, found that it could not be carried out, and have given it up. Every Treasury expert says that the bill which the gentleman proposes is impossible of execution and will produce little. It would not raise one-quarter of the sum that is required, if it produced anything, and would spread bankruptcy and disaster throughout the land. Is the gentleman really wanting to assist bonus legislation when he offers such a proposition as this? Is he not, in fact, trying to defeat it under the pretext of favoring it? I leave it for the fair-minded hearer to decide.

Mr. Speaker, I have never advocated the repeal of the excess-profits tax, as the gentleman has. I have never favored a sales tax, as he has, although the country levied heavy sales taxes on necessities in the time of the Civil War; but we have already taxed practically everything but sales, and I know of no way to raise a part of the money needed which would so little affect the prosperity of business, upon which the welfare of the working classes depends, as a small and almost insignificant tax of 1 per cent on final sales. Instead of increasing the cost of living 25 per cent, as the gentleman declared, it would not increase it 1 per cent, for it does not include rents and other large items. If everyone is going to object to any trifling tax which he may be compelled to pay, we might as well give up this legislation now. On the other hand, I shall favor getting as much of the balance by increasing the tax on big incomes as we can without forcing their money into tax-exempt securities, and thereby decreasing instead of increasing the revenue.

Mr. Speaker, in addition to his other charges, the gentleman from Illinois saw fit to insult the Republican Members of this House by charging that they sought to buy the votes of the soldiers with this compensation legislation. The unmistakable inference from this charge is that the soldiers who want this legislation were trying to sell their votes. The Republican Party can stand the insult of the gentleman from Illinois unmoved. The soldiers can also endure it, but they will not forget it. Upon our side we have sought to keep this matter entirely out of politics, but certain gentlemen on the other side, including the gentleman from Illinois, have insisted upon forcing partisan politics upon it.

At the very start, when this legislation was first suggested, it was charged on the other side that the Republican Members wanted to do nothing for the soldiers. Next, it was charged that when it was referred to the Ways and Means Committee the purpose was to bury it. At every step we have met with similar partisan proceedings until it culminated in the speech of the gentleman from Illinois on last Friday. The gentleman complains that he was not taken into all the Republican conferences, yet he has sat repeatedly as a member of a subcommittee considering the provisions of the bill when all he had to offer was the proposition which I have analyzed. Do you wonder that conferences with him ceased? I was a member of the Ways and Means Committee for more than two years before I was called on to consider any measure of any importance in the presence of the Democratic majority. The gentleman has been accorded more opportunity than I ever had during peace times when his party was in control.

Mr. Speaker, this bill ought not to be a political issue. The sacrifices made by the men to which it applies were too great, their services too noble, their cause too high and holy, to drag the matter of their compensation into the mire of partisan politics; but if it is done it will not be our doing, and we will look with confidence to the verdict of the people upon the issue thus made. [Long applause on the Republican side.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to make this observation at this time: It is the duty of the Chair to see that the rules are observed. For a number of years the membership of the House have fallen into the habit of addressing their colleagues in the second person in heated debate on the floor. This is in direct violation of the rules of the House, and it is the duty of the presiding officer to call the attention of the membership of the House to this rule and the proper practice in debate.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] is recognized for 40 minutes.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I find that my task is a little more difficult than I thought it was at the outset, and I am going to ask the indulgence of the House to permit me to proceed for 20 minutes additional, so that I may be recognized for an hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent to proceed for an additional 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I was going to make that request. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may have such time as he would like to have.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman is very kind.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that he may have 20 minutes additional. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is recognized for one hour.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I desire at the outset to congratulate my friends upon the Democratic side upon their new leader. I have had a shrewd suspicion for some years that the real leadership upon that side centered in my friend from Texas [Mr. GARNER], but this is the first time I have seen him assume the active direction of his party on the floor. I congratulate my friends of the Democracy upon the wisdom of their choice, because I know that the gentleman from Texas is one of the ablest, shrewdest, most resourceful men in either House of Congress. [Applause.] But there is one feature about it, I fear, that may prejudice his leadership. I doubt whether he can successfully pass the test laid down by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY]. I hear rumors—very definite rumors—that the gentleman from Texas is a millionaire. [Laughter.] I hear further that he acquired most of his fortune in the rearing of long-haired goats. [Laughter.] I can imagine no more insidious type of millionaire than that. [Laughter.] And it is a surprise to me to see the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] supinely permitting a millionaire to dictate the policies which he is about to follow. [Laughter.]

In the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of last Thursday, April 22, at page 5993, there appears a speech delivered by the gentleman from Illinois. I understand that it was delivered to practically empty benches. Certainly I did not hear it, because I was engaged at that time in assisting in the final draft of legislation for the benefit of the soldier that we on this side intend to see passed through this House [applause on the Republican side] in spite of any obstructions that the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] or the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] or the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and those associated with them may seek to put in our path.

I am glad I did not hear that speech, because I deplore the injection in the discussion of any great vital American question of narrow and offensive partisanship. Under ordinary circumstances I would not hold such an utterance as worthy of attention or reply. It would be better, I think, to commit it to a state of unhonored burial in the RECORD. But coming, as it does, from one whom the inscrutable ways of Providence, together with the operation of the seniority rule, has put temporarily, we trust, in a position of at least apparent power and influence upon that side of the House, the insinuations and false statements contained in it can not be lightly passed over. Since I first read and as I have reread the speech of the gentleman from Illinois I have become more and more impressed with the seriousness of the loss we have suffered—Democrats and Republicans alike—in the removal from our midst of my distinguished friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. [Applause.] No man upon that side has hit us upon this harder than he, but the harder he hit the more we liked him and respected him, because he always played fair and he fought fair. He has been a two-fisted fighter for the cause of his party. His trenchant wit cut deep sometimes, but he always observed the rules of the game.

I gave myself the pleasure last Sunday afternoon to call upon my friend from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN]. I did not see him, but I heard mighty good news. His physician informed me that he was resting after a motor drive of two hours [applause], and that he had almost entirely recovered the use of his arm and leg [applause], that his enunciation was absolutely clear. I was assured that we might expect to see the gentleman from North Carolina back here in this House within 10 days. [Applause.] That was good news, because if he were here to-day speaking for his party we know that he would not stoop, as he never has stooped, to employ the methods of a swashbuckling demagogue. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] began his speech with a really eloquent laudation of the service to their country of the soldiers of the late war and made a fervent appeal for their substantial reward. To one not familiar with the record of the gentleman it might have appeared that he was the special champion of the soldier and the father of legislation in his behalf. Let us pause for a moment and consult the record to test the sincerity of the gentleman from Illinois and ascertain whether he has the right to pose here as the friend and champion of the American soldier.

Only as lately as the 12th of March, barely five weeks ago, he said, and I quote from page 851 of the hearings:

> Mr. RAINEY. Personally I am not committed to any kind of soldiers' relief at all, or the question of whether there ought to be any legislation along these lines.

[Laughter.]

Any legislation along these lines! Not one particular kind of legislation, not adjusted compensation, not land grants or anything of that sort, but any legislation whatever. Five weeks ago the gentleman was uncertain whether we ought to have any soldier legislation at this session of Congress; at a time when every man on this side of the aisle was avowedly in favor of at least some sort of soldier legislation. [Applause.] Since then, neither in the committee nor anywhere else, have I heard the gentleman from Illinois suggest directly or indirectly that he had changed his mind. Is it to be wondered at, Mr. Speaker, that those of us on the Ways and Means Committee who have been from the beginning in favor of soldier legislation should have placed no very high value upon the services of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] might render in that regard? [Applause.]

The gentleman stridently complains of the fact, as he alleges, that members of his party upon the Ways and Means Committee were excluded from the consideration of this legislation. Upon this point I propose to state the exact facts, both because I think they should be made known to this House and to the country, and because I have some personal ambition that my speech shall be in marked contrast to that of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] in that particular regard. [Applause.]

This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] has offended by making wild statements and reckless charges without any foundation of fact upon which to base them. He began early in his career. In a speech upon the floor of this House as far back as January of 1909 he made a violent attack upon a number of very prominent gentlemen in the country, alleging that they had feloniously acquired large profits in some way or other from the taking over by this country of the Panama Canal Zone. Among the accused was a very prominent constituent of my own, a former Member of this House, Charles P. Taft, brother of the then President elect, than whom no purer or more high-minded man lives.

When called upon by Mr. Taft to back up his assertions the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] wilted. He was compelled to eat his words and did it with no very good grace. A few days later Mr. Theodore E. Burton, of Ohio, then Senator-elect, made a few remarks concerning the speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY]. He said, and I well remember the occasion:

> Mr. Chairman, I regard the speeches made by the gentleman from Illinois last month and this month as most unfortunate, not only for himself but as regards the relations between this House and the country. In a somewhat extended service here I have never known of such a nonchalant disregard for accuracy and for the reputation of men at home and abroad. [Loud applause.] (RECORD, 1909.)

And further he said:

> The gentleman from Illinois seems to be honored because he is placed in the Ananias club. The Ananias club has never taken out articles of incorporation. It does not hold annual banquets. A census of the membership would be exceedingly difficult, but I am afraid the number of eligibles would be extremely large. As the gentleman from Illinois has spoken as if it were an honor to be named as a member, some unkind persons outside will say that he is a paragon among eligibles for the first presidency of the Ananias club.

[Laughter.]

At the outset—and I am giving you the actual facts as to the drafting of this legislation—the prime difficulty of considering and formulating soldiers' legislation lay in the fact that a very large number of different committees of this House had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the various bills that had been introduced. The situation was chaotic, and it soon became evident that the only way effective action could be had was to refer all the bills to one committee. Of the fifty or sixty-odd bills introduced the great bulk of them were before the Ways and Means Committee, because that committee alone has jurisdiction to provide for the financing of the legislation, without which it would, of course, be of no force or value.

Accordingly it was decided upon this side of the House to refer all the soldiers' relief measures to the Ways and Means Committee, and a rule was accordingly brought in for that purpose. It was proposed by the leadership on that side that a special committee should be created to consider this legislation, and practically every Democrat, including the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] voted for that proposal. When that proposal was defeated, upon the question of sending this legislation to the Ways and Means Committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] declined to vote at all. Now, it can not help striking one as a rather unusual and peculiar circumstance that a gentleman sincerely in favor of any sort of legislation should vote against its being referred to a committee of which he is a member. I do not understand that process of reasoning, and so shall await with anxiety the record vote upon the bill before I am convinced that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] is or ever has been in favor of legislation for the benefit of soldiers of the late war.

To proceed with the history of this legislation: A few days after, the House, on the 5th of February, voted to commit this legislation to the Ways and Means Committee, and on the 2d of March the hearings were begun. All sorts and conditions of men were heard, and every shade of opinion was expressed. Various proposals were submitted, some running high into the billions. It is safe to say, Mr. Speaker, that the aggregate of the various proposals submitted would have totaled more than our entire national debt.

It was not until the 24th of March that a definite, concrete, intelligible plan was submitted by the executive committee of the American Legion. They presented a draft of a bill, very crudely drawn, as they admitted, but which at least constituted a basis on which the committee might act and upon which some reasonably accurate estimate of the cost might be made. It was that bill that the committee took as a basis for the work.

It was estimated that the cost would involve, roughly, about two and one-half billion dollars. Of course, the first question was to decide how the necessary funds could be provided. Should we raise them by increasing the outstanding indebtedness through loans or raise them by taxation? In view of the fact that our outstanding bonded indebtedness at that time amounted to more than $25,000,000,000, and that the deficit represented by short-time certificates amounted to more than $3,000,000,000, it was obvious that a bond issue of $2,000,000,000 would not only be unwise but in all probability disastrous to the credit of the Government. We were informed by the Secretary of the Treasury and other responsible financial authorities that a new issue of bonds could not be floated at less than 6 per cent, if at all; and that if floated it would cause a loss of not less than 10 per cent in our outstanding Government obligations.

In view of these conditions the committee voted by a very large majority that no increase either in our bonded or floating indebtedness could be thought of.

It having been definitely and finally settled that the amount necessary to finance any plan for the benefit of the soldiers that we might agree upon should be raised by taxation, the committee proceeded to consider the various plans proposed and especially that suggested by the American Legion. This consisted of four definite propositions. First, a land-settlement scheme modeled substantially upon the bill introduced by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and favorably reported by the Committee on the Public Lands; second, a plan to assist the soldiers in purchasing homes; third, a plan for vocational training; and, fourth, a payment of adjusted compensation.

For the purpose of considering and speeding up the legislation the committee subdivided into five subcommittees, three for the consideration of the first three plans proposed by the legion, a fourth to consider various other plans proposed, and a fifth to consider the adjusted-compensation proposal, together with the financing of the entire scheme. This committee consisted of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], and myself, representing the majority; the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] representing the minority.

Far from being excluded the Democratic members of the Ways and Means Committee were invited and did participate in the consideration and formulation of these various pieces of legislation. It speedily became evident, however, that instead of assisting the Democratic members were doing all they could to put stumblingblocks and obstacles in our way. It was frankly admitted by some that they proposed, if possible, to make the legislation so obnoxious as to prevent its passage. None of us expected or intended that soldiers' legislation should be made a partisan question, and if it has become so it is because it was forced upon us by the obstructive tactics of the minority.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will yield to my friend.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman is now referring to the subcommittee. I hope the gentleman will correct that with reference to the committee of which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. COPLEY] was chairman, and the committee of which the gentleman from Oregon was chairman, as to having any obstructions thrown in the way.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Undoubtedly I understand the gentleman from Texas participated in the draft of that entire portion of the bill.

Mr. GARNER. That is true.

Mr. LONGWORTH. He was given fair treatment and sat with the committee, and is as much responsible as anybody.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield, so that the record may be clear?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. At the conclusion of the consideration of the bill, and the gentleman from Ohio knows how it was performed, if the gentleman from Illinois would tell us, we were advised that they had been fixed.

Mr. LONGWORTH. On the contrary, and I imagine the gentleman can not deny it, he was at the meeting when the final draft was made, and he will be at the final meeting when it is passed on. He is entitled to as much credit as Mr. COPLEY or anybody else for the drafting of that wise piece of legislation.

In our subcommittee three general taxation schemes were proposed as a basis for financing the bill. One, a tax on general sales, which was agreed upon by the three members of the majority; second, a proposal by the gentleman from North Carolina to reimpose the taxes on incomes and excess profits carried in the revenue bill of 1918; in other words, to put back the automatic 25 per cent decreases upon the incomes and profits which was made to apply to the year of 1919. The other plan proposed came from the gentleman from Illinois, to make a retroactive tax upon so-called war profits for the past three years.

The plan of the gentleman from North Carolina was seriously considered and seriously discussed. To my mind it had very many meritorious features. Personally, I have always felt that the last Congress made a great mistake in following the advice given by the late Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. McAdoo, a few days before his retirement, to automatically reduce taxes before we had any accurate knowledge of what our next year's expenses were going to be, and I think that view is justified by the fact that he underestimated by nearly 50 per cent what our expenses in fact turned out to be. Had these taxes remained as they were in the original revenue act we would not have found ourselves in the gravely serious financial condition which now confronts us. [Applause.] The only serious objection to the proposal of the gentleman from North Carolina was that to increase at this time the excess-profits tax 25 per cent would undoubtedly greatly and at once increase the cost of living. To my mind the outrageously high cost of the necessaries of life to-day is due primarily and principally to two causes, one the 10 per cent cost-plus contract system used by this administration in connection with most of the war activities; and, second, the excess-profits tax. The cost-plus system necessarily tremendously increased costs because the higher the cost the greater profit to the contractor, and brought about the most iniquitous riot of profiteering that this country has ever known. It was argued at the beginning that the excess-profits tax was not a tax which could be passed to the consumer, and perhaps that was true at the very outset, but it soon developed that this tax in most cases was entirely passed, often in multiplied form, to the consumer. To increase it now would inevitably result in an immediate and very great increase of the cost of living.

A general sales tax of 1 per cent on the final sale only would, on the contrary, not affect the cost of living at all. It is too small to be passed on, and even if so passed could not be multiplied. The tax on a sale of $10,000 worth of goods, for instance, would only be $100, and to my mind could not be passed on by the seller. Nobody is going to charge a dollar and one cent for an article that he has been selling for a dollar. That is not the way business is done.

Mr. KNUTSON. The gentleman from Illinois said $1.25.

Mr. LONGWORTH. The gentleman from Illinois said $1.25, but he was speaking under misapprehension. The proposed tax is not on turnover sales; it is a tax only on the final retail sale. It can not be more than one cent on every dollar.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, would it interrupt the gentleman if he were to yield to me at this point?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be very glad to yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, simply because thus far we have only some information through the newspapers as to what the bill may possibly be, is the gentleman in a position to outline to us the bill that we will be called upon to consider?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I would be very glad to do so if I had a little more time. If the gentleman can secure me 10 minutes additional, I shall be glad to tell him the substantial features, and I think I would be justified in doing so, though he must realize that all the details have not been finally agreed upon.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. I quite understand; but I mean in the main. The gentleman would be able to state the features of the bill in the main? I think the Members on this side would be very willing to grant an extension of time, and, Mr. Speaker, I now ask that the gentleman's time be extended for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Ohio be extended for 10 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. KNUTSON. Have the details been finally decided upon?

Mr. LONGWORTH. No. I would feel justified in stating only what I know of the main features. There are some features that have not been finally determined.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. All of the matters, of course, are subject to change?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, absolutely; and the only reason that I should feel justified at all would be because so many gentlemen have founded their objections to this legislation upon newspaper articles which do not give the exact facts, and I think it might be well to remove at least some of those misapprehensions.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. This bill you have attempted to prepare, of course, would last only until Friday night, as I understand it, and then probably you will consider the matter of changing it after you have had your conference?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, certainly. We are going to present it to the full committee.

Mr. GARNER. It is tentatively prepared until you get to your conference on Friday night?

Mr. KNUTSON. We are operating on the principles of a democracy.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. Is this tax to be put on each individual sale or upon monthly sales of a merchant, if it happens to be a merchant?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think it would be fair—and that is perhaps as far as I could go—to state to the gentleman what our taxation scheme is, roughly. The total amount, as near as we can figure it, of the cost of the plan we have in mind would be about $1,800,000,000. That we propose to raise in two years. We are proposing a tax which in two years will raise that amount of money. We propose to put the tax into effect on the 1st of December. In the case of a sales tax the tax would be paid monthly for all those who do a business of more than $500 a month.

Mr. KEARNS. In the case of a retail business, we will say, it is not a tax on each sale individually; it is on the business done per month by the hotel or the business house, or whatever the business is.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Oh, yes. We do not propose a tax for service pure and simple, but it is principally for furnishing material and commodities.

Mr. KEARNS. Is there a tax on the hotel business in the way of furnishing meals?

Mr. LONGWORTH. There would not be a tax on a separate meal.

Mr. KEARNS. Would there be on the collective business of the month done by the hotel?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I have not thought particularly with reference to a hotel, but in my judgment it would not be paid more than once a month.

Mr. KEARNS. Those are matters which came into my mind in hearing the gentleman discuss the proposition. Now, I have not any opportunity to see the bill, of course——

Mr. LONGWORTH. No; the bill is not completed, and, as I said, it is impossible to give full and final accurate details.

Mr. KEARNS. As the bill is drawn so far would it include business of that character? I am not interested in the hotel business, but it just occurred to my mind. Would it take in business of that character?

Mr. LONGWORTH. In my judgment it would not include the hotel business.

Mr. KEARNS. It would take in the merchandise sold in various stores throughout the country?

Mr. LONGWORTH. It would take in merchandise upon its final sale.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says, I understand, that the sales tax is to begin on December 1. I congratulate the gentlemen of the committee. Of course, the election comes in November, and it will not be put on until it is over. I think that is very wise. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. LONGWORTH. I think the gentleman undoubtedly will give us wise advice on that subject. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Now, this tax on final sales is not a large tax. At the outside it is estimated that it would not raise more than about $400,000,000 a year. I do not think, therefore, that there are the same objections to it as to most consumption taxes. Furthermore, we advocate it only as a temporary measure to remain in force for only two years as a means of raising about half the amount necessary for a given purpose, to wit, to recompense the ex-service men. Roughly speaking, if every soldier of the late war should avail himself of one of the alternative propositions carried in our proposed bill the cost would be about $1,800,000,000, of which the proposed sales tax would raise in two years about $850,000,000. The remainder of the amount necessary we propose to raise by taxes on tobacco, real estate transfers, stock exchange transactions and a small increase of the higher incomes. To my mind it is a safe and sane program, and if carried out will not injuriously affect business, damage the Government credit, or affect the cost of living. It is the one and only program that has been suggested or to my mind can be suggested to finance a soldiers' relief measure which possesses these three qualifications.

The plan suggested by the gentleman fom Illinois was never seriously discussed even by himself in the committee. The only bill which he has introduced upon the subject is so crudely drawn that he himself has practically repudiated it. I have been unable to secure a copy of the bill introduced by him to-day or that introduced by the gentleman from South Dakota. The gentleman from Illinois will correct me if I am wrong. I understand that his new bill increases the tax from 50 to 80 per cent?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The gentleman is wrong.

Mr. LONGWORTH. I am rather glad I am. [Laughter on the Republican side.] Well, in the former bill he proposed vaguely to impose a tax of 50 per cent on so-called war profits for the past five years, ignoring the fact that most of those war profits—ignoring the fact, as the gentleman from Iowa has pointed out, that these profits have already paid a tax of 50 per cent or more.

He seemed to think, as do some backwoods financiers, that profits are hoarded and kept in cash. Financiers of this type have a vague idea that profits are kept in a treasure chest in stacks of gold coin and that all the Government has to do is to open the chest and take out the coin and that business and industry will go on just the same. Whereas every sane man knows that the profits made two or three or four years ago are to-day in land or bricks or mortar or machinery, and that the imposition of such taxes as he proposes upon what has in effect become capital would ruin the industries of the country.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I suggest one thing that I omitted to state, that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] intended evidently to levy taxes on taxes, as otherwise he would never get any money.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course. I do not propose to argue the constitutionality of such a proposition, except to say that it would mean confiscation pure and simple and that the laws of the United States do not permit confiscation. Of course, the gentleman from Illinois does not seriously think—no man seriously thinks—that such a silly scheme could be enacted into law, even if we in Congress were idiots enough to pass it. Everyone knows that it would be vetoed. The President of the United States has never been accused even by his most vigorous opponents of ultraconservatism, yet he said in his message to Congress on December 2, 1919:

> There is a point at which in peace times high rates of income and profits taxes discourage energy, remove incentive to new enterprise, encourage extravagant expenditures, and produce industrial stagnation with consequent unemployment and other attendant evils.

The President has been known to change his mind upon occasion, but no human being could seriously think for a moment that a man who wrote those words could advocate a proposition which on its face would go further than any other measure suggested in this or any other Congress to bring about the evils he seeks to avoid. Reduced to its lowest terms the scheme advocated by the gentleman from Illinois simply means this: If you accept it you will have no soldiers' legislation of any kind. Little more than a month ago, according to the RECORD, he was doubtful whether we ought to have any soldiers' legislation. Evidently he has now resolved his doubts against it, for he proposes a measure which everybody here knows will kill it beyond hope of resurrection.

I warn you, my colleagues on this side, to fear the Greeks bearing gifts. Distrust all proposals coming from the other side to "popularize" the measure upon which you will soon be called to vote. They are made with a design not of helping it, but of ruining it. Some say that a sales tax would not be popular. No tax is popular, but the true test of any tax is not its popularity, but its justice. To my mind any one who would object to this infinitesimally small tax for the one purpose of payment of adjusted compensation to the men who fought our battles in the World War would be a pretty poor sort. I am bound to confess that as an individual a proposition to make Henry Ford and the gallant Edsall pay the cost of soldiers' benefit legislation would not be without its attractive side [applause], but as a Member of Congress I know that we can not do it, and even if we did he would get it back by increasing the cost of flivvers. [Laughter.]

The Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee have labored long and earnestly, sometimes with and sometimes without the collaboration of the Democratic members, and we have unanimously agreed upon a measure in all its essential details which will be satisfactory to the soldiers and, we think, satisfactory to the country, and we have agreed upon a method of raising the funds which will do the work with the least disturbance of the country's business or of our Government's credit. The bill which we shall bring to you will not be perfect. There will be in it some features which you will not like. There are in it many features which I do not like, but that is true of every great piece of constructive legislation which comes before this body. I urge you, my colleagues, to accept it as the most practical solution of one of the gravest problems that has ever confronted Congress by voting for it as it is. You may not get everything you want, but if you accept the other horn of the dilemma and vote against it you are practically sure to get nothing.

Mr. GARRETT. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT. I would like to ask the gentleman about the beneficiaries of the proposed plan. It may be that newspaper reports have been incorrect in that as well as other phases of the bill. Are officers excluded? How has that been determined?

Mr. LONGWORTH. I will be glad to answer the gentleman. Officers are included up to and including the rank of captain.

Mr. GARRETT. And those who were members of the military forces prior to the beginning of the war?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Those men who were enlisted before the breaking out of the war will be entitled to the same credit as the other soldiers up to the date of the armistice.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. How about the boys working in the spruce camps and getting high wages?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the National Guard also be included?

Mr. LONGWORTH. They were as much soldiers as any others. They were all members of the National Army.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. In that connection, may I ask the gentleman one question?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. Is the gentleman able to state approximately about what the payment per capita would average?

Mr. LONGWORTH. The payment to the——

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. The payment to soldiers per man. What would be the average bonus payment? How many hundred dollars?

Mr. LONGWORTH. We had a great deal of difficulty in determining what the average service is. At the beginning of our investigation we were informed by the War Department the average service was about 10 months. But it developed later that the average service ran considerably more than a year. I should say that probably the average service was about 400 days. That answers the gentleman's question?

Mr. MOORE of Virginia. And it is $1.25 per day?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; for adjusted compensation.

Mr. OLIVER. Did the gentleman provide compensation for the widows of those who served and were killed?

Mr. MADDEN. That is being taken care of, anyhow.

Mr. LONGWORTH. That is being taken care of now. I thought the gentleman meant those who died since——

Mr. OLIVER. I had reference to the widows of those who were killed during the war.

Mr. LONGWORTH. They are not covered by this bill. They are provided for otherwise.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. I wanted to ask the gentleman a question. I did not catch exactly the answer to the gentleman from Tennessee about the enlisted men in the Regular Army. Are they provided for?

Mr. LONGWORTH. For the actual war period.

Mr. HUMPHREYS. That is, those who enlisted in the Regular Army from the declaration of war to the armistice?

Mr. LONGWORTH. To the armistice.

Mr. TREADWAY. As a matter of information for the Members, would it not be advisable for the gentleman to add that when he describes the officers that are included, it includes the rank in the Navy corresponding to that of captain in the Army?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Of course, the same would be true of the Navy, those of similar rank in the Navy.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under the provisions of his proposed measure it includes not only ex-service men, but also Regulars who are now in the service?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Those who are now in the service, of course, would not receive any compensation except for the period during the war, if they were in the war.

Mr. DICKINSON of Missouri. But those who are now Regulars in the service for the period of the war would be entitled?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes; for the period of actual warfare.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LONGWORTH. Yes.

Mr CONNALLY. I will ask the gentleman this: In some of the States the National Guard were mobilized under the State laws and were designated by the Federal Government for the draft at some future date but never were actually drafted into the Federal service. Is there any provision in this bill whereby those men who were in camp and who were drilling would be compensated?

Mr. LONGWORTH. As to that the details are not finally determined upon. They will not be until they are submitted to the minority.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come to a more personal side of this controversy. I regret intensely that occasion should have arisen to discuss personalities, least of all my own. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] has seen fit to charge that I, together with three others, Members of this House, am influenced in my attitude upon this legislation by my own personal possessions. I find myself almost at a loss to make fitting retort. My mind happily, as I think, seems to be constructed upon an entirely different plane from that of the gentleman from Illinois. If a thought or suspicion of any one of my colleagues so mean, so contemptible, so base, should find lodgment there, I would have fears of my sanity. I do not form my judgments of the integrity or ability of my colleagues by what they have or what they have not. My high estimate of the intellectual integrity of the gentleman from Illinois has been formed without any knowledge of his financial solvency. That he is mentally and morally solvent is my only concern. I do not go snooping around the Treasury to see what income taxes my colleagues pay. I have no idea whether the tax of the gentleman from Illinois was large or small. All I am sure of is that he made a correct return. Had he the wealth of a Rockefeller I am entirely confident that it would not influence him one iota in his conception and performance of a public duty. My retort, then, to my friend from Illinois is not the time-honored one, "You're another." On the contrary, it is an admission—and I make it here publicly—that if there is a flaw in the intellectual integrity of every other Member of this House, his at least is flawless and utterly pure. [Applause.]

A word now about the much maligned steering committee. I am, as the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] have said, a member of it. I am also a member of the Committee on Ways and Means, which is drafting this soldiers' legislation, and a member of the committee on committees, which created them both. I ought to be competent, therefore, to know just what the steering committee has had to do with the taxation and any other features of this bill.

Now, first let me correct the misapprehension that the steering committee is a boss on this side of the House. On the contrary, we are the mere legislative agents and servants of the majority. We were elected unanimously in the conference, not the caucus—because we have no caucuses on this side. [Laughter.] We were elected unanimously, and we can be removed to-morrow if we fail to be representative of the mind of the majority. That we are still here is proof of the fact that, so far at least, we have done fairly well in crystallizing the thought of the majority into legislation.

I will candidly admit, if it affords any satisfaction to the gentleman from Texas, that I had some doubt when the steering committee was first formed as to whether it was sufficiently representative. When it came time to organize this House I made just as hard a fight as I knew how upon two propositions: First, to enlarge the steering committee; and, second, to modify in some respects the seniority rule.

My thought in regard to the steering committee was that it should consist of nine rather than of five members, so that it might be more representative, geographically, and in cleavage of thought, of the body of the majority. My friends and I suggested the names of four gentlemen for the consideration of the Republican conference. They were the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. REAVIS, the gentleman from Minnesota, Mr. ANDERSON, the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. SLEMP, and the gentleman from California, Mr. NOLAN. We did not go to the Treasury to ascertain whether they were millionaires. We only knew that they were good men. The majority of the conference, however, without questioning the ability or the integrity of these gentlemen, thought that inasmuch as the committee was apt to be called together at any time, practically, of the day or night, a committee of nine would be unwieldy, and they defeated our proposal, so that the committee was left at five. To-day it is but four, because the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. Moore—and I do not know whether he is classed as a millionaire or not—resigned to accept the mayoralty of the city of Philadelphia. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL]—I have no idea as to what his personal fortune may be—is the chairman of that committee, and we meet in regular consultation with the Speaker.

Now, I speak by the book, gentlemen of this House, when I say that the steering committee as such has had absolutely nothing whatever to do with the taxation or any other features of this bill. Except myself, no one knows any more about them than any other Member of the House. Neither the steering committee as such nor any Member except myself has made any suggestion, directly or indirectly, as to the manner or method of taxation. The responsibility for the soldiers' relief bill, which we are about to offer you, rests solely upon the Republican members of the Committee on Ways and Means, and we accept it gladly. We would have greatly preferred that there should have been unanimous action, but the Democratic minority have made that impossible. They have not sought to help us. On the contrary, they have deliberately sought to hinder us in the formulation of soldiers' relief legislation.

They have made it apparent that they have intended, and still intend, to load up this bill with such foolish and destructive propositions as to make its final passage impossible.

A word in closing, Mr. Speaker. In all the years that I have been in Congress this is the first time I have ever known a Member to refer to the personal possessions of another, much less to intimate that those possessions might have any influence upon his conception or performance of his public duty. I believe—and this one unpleasant episode will not shake my belief—that this House of Representatives is the greatest leveler of any body on the face of the earth. I have seen men come here with great reputations and lose themselves. I have seen men come here with no reputations and find themselves. It does not take the membership of this House long to size a man up, and I have found its judgment to be invariably accurate. That judgment, thank heaven, has been based upon what a man is, not upon what he has. [Applause.] That is what makes us the most truly democratic assembly on the face of this earth. If after a reasonable period you gain the respect and confidence of this House you have gained what no accident of birth or wealth or influence can give you. You have won a prize which it is beyond the power of any other man or any set of men to bestow. Let us see to it that that prize remains pure and untarnished. Let us not diminish it by criticizing or calling into question each other's motives. No matter how widely we may differ upon questions of national policy, let us not even hint that our opinions are not honestly arrived at. [Applause.] Thus we shall preserve our self-respect, without which we can not hope to hold the respect and confidence of the country. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN] is recognized for 30 minutes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, one of the most inspiring and delightful recollections associated with my membership in this body was the splendid spirit of patriotism and cooperation which prevailed on both sides of this aisle when the country was passing through the crisis of war. The spirit of this House on both sides was to submerge individual opinions, to banish partisan convictions, and to unite for the one purpose of carrying our flag to victory.

THE WAR NOT OVER.

They say the war is over. Yes; hostilities have ceased. Men no longer stand in battle array; but the economic conditions which were caused by the war are still potent—weighing just as hard, just as intolerably, upon the shoulders of the people as when we were in the midst of war. Profiteering, incited by the war, goes on apace. The devastation of war remains unrepaired, the wounds of our soldiers are still not healed, and the economic confusion into which our affairs have been thrown present problems of the gravest nature. To settle these will take all the resolution, all the thought, and all the cooperation which we may be able to summon or command.

These problems are, if anything, more serious and more vital to our future welfare than any of those which arose during the progress of the war. It was easy when the drums beat the alarm of war to get men to fight. It was easy to commandeer the wealth, the brains, and the brawn of the land when the honor and prestige of our flag were at stake. The spirit of our fathers filled our hearts, sanctified our efforts, and guided our arms to victory. The holiest traditions were then aroused. War without brought peace within. The barriers of party, race, and creed were swept aside and we became one people united in thought, word, and deed.

Mr. Speaker, the most that I desire to do is to urge upon the Members of this body, independent of party, to recognize the fact that there is a great, predominating issue before the people of this country, and that they will not suffer or endure petty politics. This Congress must get down to brass tacks and do something, and it will not avail either on that side or on this, my friends, to say to the people that we alone as party men have done this, that, or the other. Neither side should try to take the credit to themselves for the solution of the problems which confront us. Those issues bear equally on both sides of this aisle, and as we won the war hand in hand it behooves us to solve the problems of the hour hand in hand.

The people have almost reached the limit of endurance. The high cost of living is the specter that sits at every table in every home in the land. With wages higher than ever before in our history, the clerk, the bookkeeper, the teacher, the mechanic, the farmer, and the laborer all alike feel the presence of an unseen but all-pervading oppression. In their bitterness they blame one another. The farmer blames the middleman. The mechanic blames the butcher, the baker, and the grocer, and these shift the burden back to the farmer, the stock raiser, and the dairyman. When the pinch first came we were in the midst of war and conditions which were believed to be the result of war were borne with patriotic spirit—with patience and submission.

But the war is over for nearly 18 months. Yet prices still advance. The cost of living has nearly doubled since the armistice. Since November 11, 1918, food has advanced in price 17 per cent; rents, 29 per cent; clothing, 84 per cent; fuel, light, and heat, 9 per cent; and there has been a general advance in all other items entering into the cost of maintenance of over 30 per cent. While the war lasted the people, patriotic to the core, expected, and were willing, to bear the sacrifice; but, with the war over, they find conditions aggravated, without apparent reason; the wage earners are disappointed and discontented. And while the condition of the masses is in this intolerable plight, they see vast fortunes accumulated, and accumulating, in almost every branch of industry. They note that over 4,000 millionaires were created by the war. They note that big corporations are declaring dividends of 100 per cent out of those very things in which the prices have mounted highest and which make the largest draft upon their earnings.

THE BONUS QUESTION.

But why are we so much concerned here to-day over the problem of increasing taxation at a time when all our thoughts should be directed toward the alleviation of the country's burdens? I am told that it is because the soldiers of the great World War are hammering at the gates of the Capitol and demanding a bonus. They claim, I am informed, that while they were toiling in the camps or facing death in the trenches many unscrupulous men got fat on rich contracts; others profiteered on the necessities of life, and still others, who should have worn the khaki, took refuge on the farm, in the shops, in the shipping plants, and in the various war industries, drawing exceptionally high pay, while the managers of these industries reaped unconscionable war profits and piled up immense fortunes. All of this is true. But let me digress a moment and consider war profits.

WAR PROFITS.

Of all economic fallacies the idea that special enhanced profits in time of war are inevitable and allowable ranks as about the meanest and most ignoble that ever found entry in the human mind. To think that men should be so base as to claim monetary compensation in order to stimulate them to produce the things essential for the conduct of the war surpasses sane comprehension. The boys of our land were besought by spellbinders to answer to the call to arms, and while they were patriotically responding, other men, with too much money to risk their precious lives in battle, were clamoring here in Washington to be allowed to set war prices on their products and to mulct the Government and the people out of millions.

And the unfortunate thing is that they had their way. They fixed war prices, but they also fixed a halter around the neck of the consumer. This step having been once taken, a precedent was set for all to follow. The Government allowed big margins of profit on steel, coal, and lumber. The pretense was that these patriots needed this stimulation in order to encourage production—a most vicious, dangerous principle. Then their turpitude became manifest. The ordinary, time-honored, but yet revered spirit of patriotism was to be sufficient to stimulate the mechanic, the farmer, the clerk, the teacher, and the laborer. These must skimp themselves out of meager salaries to buy Liberty bonds; but the great masters of industry, the financiers and big producers, must, forsooth, have the encouragement of war profits. With this example before them of paternalistic governmental indulgence, was it any wonder that all others, neglected in the beginning, should strive to come under the patriarchal cloak? When all were safely sheltered under this vicious precedent, then labor asserted itself and claimed the right to enhanced compensation. Nor can they be blamed for that. When they were compelled to pay 16 and 18 cents a bottle for milk to keep life in their babies, 10 cents for a 5-cent loaf of bread, and double prices all along the line for meats and vegetables, clothing, and the necessities of life, were they far astray from the equities when they demanded only a proportional increase in wages? When the corporate gougers found that the payment of increased wages cut deeply into their profits, their next step was to increase their profits.

Then followed other increases in the prices of the simple necessities of life, and the high cost of living iniquity became firmly intrenched in the Nation's habit. A wild orgy of waste, extravagance, and self-indulgence set in, but the most pathetic feature of it all was the gradual breaking down of the fiber of our national sense of integrity and fair play. And thus it came to pass that while the youth of our country were volunteering and being drafted to the camps and battle fields, involving the sacrifice of their homes, their families, their trades and different callings, and their life opportunities, other men were conniving to get into war industries where they would be exempt from military duty and at the same time draw better pay than they ever earned before. This is the situation which has aroused the ire of the returning soldiers and stirred within them the deepest feelings of resentment. On the other hand, those who honestly served in the war industries and "did their bit" to win the war should not be the victims of this resentment. While some may have sought this work to evade military duty, the great bulk of them did their duty conscientiously. While their pay was high, they usually had families dependent on them, and the apparently large wages they received were soon neutralized and all benefit lost to them by the unscrupulous exactions of the profiteers. Therefore neither the man who went across to nobly fight nor the man who stayed at home to nobly work should be arrayed against each other. They are both the victims of a situation in which they should both unite to save themselves and the Nation from impending ruin.

In the task before us we should not be misled by false sentiment and we should neither, at the same time, be too much influenced by resentment. We should direct our spleen against those who overstepped the latitude that was given them and who now, after the war is over, continue to manipulate the machinery devised for a patriotic purpose for their own ever-increasing aggrandizement.

It is not fair to the faithful to repay them for their efforts by imposing a new tax on everything they need in their daily lives. Likewise you will hurt them equally if you put an increased tax on the profiteers, which will be immediately shifted over upon the shoulders of the innocent.

IS NEW TAXATION NECESSARY?

On the other hand, is new taxation necessary? The first principle of sound taxation is to avoid the occasion of taxation. If we can get along, therefore, without the cumbersome and irritating cash-sales tax, and if we can carry on the Government and supply the needs of the hour without putting more fodder into the hopper of the moneyed interests by sharing further in their excess-profits pilfering, ought we not to do so?

SOMETHING SHOULD BE DONE FOR THE SOLDIERS.

Something should be done for the soldiers, but it ought to be done at once. Without encouraging them at all in the notion that they have a grievance against their fellow workers in the Great War, we ought to do that which is manifestly just. I worked out a plan for their relief which will enable the Government to help them immediately, without the tedious delays incident to raising new revenues.

HOUSE BILL 13333.

My bill is House bill 13333. Under its provisions all war-risk insurance premiums deducted from the pay of both officers and men are returned to them. This is urged on the ground that it was inherently wrong for the Government to make its soldiers pay for the hazards of their calling. They were the Government's risk as well as their own, and this money was improperly deducted from their pay. I also propose to return to the enlisted personnel all allotments deducted from their pay for the support of their families and dependents. They were fighting in their country's cause, and the least that the Nation could, and should do is to make up the deductions from their pay used for the support of their dependents.

Mr. SWOPE. Has the gentleman obtained any estimate as to the cost of the proposition that he is advocating?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Six hundred and sixty-seven million—since this figure was arrived at the War Risk Insurance Bureau has reduced its estimate of the number of soldiers making allotments to 1,661,933; consequently the cost of returning the insurance premiums and allotments will be $517,903,595 instead of $667,000,000, as above given—as against two billion five hundred and fifty-five million for the American Legion bill.

Take the case of the average soldier in the service: He received $30 a month. If he was insured for $5,000, and if his youth was in his favor, he would pay $3.25 as premium and, besides, would make an allotment to his family of $15. That was $18.25 out of the $30. Then, as he was a good patriot, he would subscribe for Liberty bonds. Some of the boys told me that they only had a few dollars left for spending money when they got their pay. It is these boys who, doubtless, feel that they have been unjustly treated. I believe they were unjustly treated, and we ought to be just to them.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. CONNALLY. I understand the gentleman is charging Congress with the enactment of legislation that dealt unjustly with these men. I want to suggest to the gentleman that statements of that kind are the cause of the widespread criticism of Congress.

Mr. KING. If the gentleman will pardon me, I do not think the gentleman from New York made any such statement.

Mr. CONNALLY. He said a moment ago that Congress had treated the boys unjustly.

Mr. KING. But the gentleman is trying to place him in the attitude of laying the blame on Congress. He has not done that.

Mr. CONNALLY. He said that Congress passed this legislation.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I do not know what may happen if the gentlemen go any further in the colloquy. It was not my intention to reflect on Congress. I may say, however, that it is perfectly possible for Congress to do an unjust act. Congress very frequently has done so in the past, and it has done so in the exercise of its deliberate judgment. The determination of the justice or injustice of an act is a matter of argumentation. Of course, it is only my opinion, and my say so does not make it so. Since I have been here some measures have been passed that, in my judgment, impose unduly on certain classes of people and give advantage to others. But that is only a matter of opinion. I do not imagine any of the boys in the Army or Navy, from anything I might say or have said, would weaken in their patriotism in the slightest degree.

I believe that the war-risk insurance premiums and the allotments should be returned, and I maintain it was wrong to deduct them in the beginning. If the allotments for 11 months, which was the average service, were returned it would amount to $165. This together with the average insurance premium of $55 will make a rather tidy sum, which will undoubtedly relieve their present distress and put them on their feet. It will also relieve us of the anxiety and the need of quibbling as to how the money should be raised. It could be raised in the regular course, by certificates of indebtedness and short-time notes. The boys would get their money immediately and not have to wait, as under the American Legion bill, for over a year before they could receive a fraction of its benefit.

THE AMERICAN LEGION BILL.

Under the American Legion bill it is proposed to limit the soldiers to only one of fourfold features. If he takes the cash bonus, he will be denied the rest. This is unjust to him and unjust to the country. You are not encouraging him to found a farm, establish a ranch, or make a home. You are simply giving him a few dollars and casting him adrift. This is wrong. He will soon spend the money and be no better off than before. Some of my colleagues say, in answer to my argument, "Well, if they want it, give it to them and let them take the responsibility." That, I submit, is not sound policy. It is unkind to the men and unjust to the Nation.

Under the narrow and limited beneficence of this bill the present necessities of the veterans will doubtless tempt the vast majority to accept the alluring prospect of a few hundred dollars in hand, and thus cut themselves off from the more substantial benefits of land settlement, home building, and self-improvement. On the other hand, even in these directions the bill is more glittering in promises than substantial in benefits.

An examination of the appropriations provided for the other benefits under the other titles of the bill will startlingly reveal its utter inadequacy to meet the gigantic problem before us. The $500,000,000 for the farm and ranch settlement scheme is only a drop in the bucket. It will only provide farms and ranches for a little over 60,000 out of the 4,500,000 soldiers who are fondly centering their hopes on this bill. It is true that those who get the bonus can not receive the benefit of this land settlement provision; but even those who avail themselves of it must wait 10 years for the gratification of their ambition, for the appropriation is spread out over that period.

I believe that land settlements and city and suburban home loans and vocational education should be made the subject of separate legislation.

Under my plan the veterans would receive back their war-risk insurance premiums and the allotments deducted from their pay. It would not be a very large sum, but the average would be $210 each. But the advantage is that they would receive it at once and would not have to await the deliberations of subsequent Congresses. They would get it immediately, without any string, and when they receive it they need not feel that they are the recipients of any bounty or gratuity. Neither need they feel that their necessities have obliged them to sell their rights for a mess of pottage, or that they had estopped themselves from receiving the other advantages of land grants, home building loans, and vocational education which a grateful country will no doubt be willing to accord to them.

SHALL WE TAX CASH SALES?

The American Legion bill will involve an immediate expenditure of $2,555,000,000. Do you expect the people to be patient at the suggestion of raising this revenue for the Government by taxes upon cash sales? Taxes which are added visibly to everything they buy—the suit of clothes they wear, the food they eat, and the bottle of medicine they must buy when dread sickness or disease enters the threshold? Will they stand for this when they know that the trusts which oppress them are still permitted to pile up excess profits without let or hindrance? No, Mr. Speaker, such an attempt would be dangerous. It must not be attempted at this time.

A RETROACTIVE TAX IMPRACTICABLE.

Another suggestion is made that we raise the amount required by a retroactive tax upon war profits. Well, war profits are odious and it is not through sympathy that we should spare them; but it would be like trying to go after water that has gone through the mill and passed down the stream to the sea. They have paid their quota of the tax levied upon them and the balance has been divided among the stockholders and spent, or otherwise distributed beyond the reach of taxation. That proposal, therefore, is impracticable.

OR INCREASE THE TAX ON EXCESS PROFITS?

"But," you ask, "what shall we do?" Some of my colleagues on this side of the chamber answer: "We will correct that; we will increase the tax on excess profits." Pause, gentlemen! Not so fast! Do you know that every increase in excess-profits tax will be shifted right back to the consumer? Are you so blind as not to see that the entire tax is added to the cost of the product and paid by the last purchaser in the chain of exchange—the ultimate consumer? If you do not, you ought to know. The profiteer himself admits that and his immense earnings testify to the truth of his confession.

You know that at this very moment the big interests are fomenting and fostering a vigorous propaganda to entirely abolish the excess-profits tax. Every mail brings to our desks heart-rending appeals showing how iniquitous the excess-profits tax is; how it is added directly to the cost of their production and is paid, in the long run, by the consumer. Influential papers, big bankers, and chambers of commerce, controlled by the financial and industrial leaders in their respective communities, all join in the chorus. They all sing the same song. Their interest in the common people is marvelously strange, as well as pathetic. And, then, to appeal to the Government side of the question, they tell us how intricate and irritable these taxes are, how difficult they are to compute, and how expensive they are to the Government to collect.

All very plausible, indeed, Mr. Speaker; but if we repeal the excess-profits tax, what guaranty have we that they will cease piling up their excess profits? Ah, gentlemen, there is the rub. What guaranty can they give the people that prices will come down? None whatever. On the contrary, the excess-profits will go on as before, and what they save in taxes will be added to their already overswollen capital. Have you any doubt of that? Then what do you think of this confession, contained in the report of the New York Chamber of Commerce?

This confession is found on page 15 of the supplement to the March Bulletin of the New York Chamber of Commerce and reads as follows:

> The detrimental and deadening effect of the heavy taxes on incomes and the profit taxes is now generally recognized. Such exactions from the larger incomes, both individual and corporate, result in the absorption by Government of that portion of the income of the country's industry which would naturally be annually added to capital.

Of course, we did not need this to learn what the corporations will do with the margin of excess profits left to them after the repeal of the excess-profits tax. We know they will add this margin to their capital, because that is what they have been doing right along.

For instance, the Standard Oil of Indiana has just increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $30,000,000. Many of the branches of the Standard Oil Co. throughout the United States have surpluses far in excess of their permitted capital waiting for the opportunity—the propitious moment—to increase their capitalization. The Atlantic Refining Co. has increased its capital from $5,000,000 to $50,000,000. The Continental Oil Co. has raised its capital from $3,000,000 to $18,000,000.

Of course, all these increases in capital simply mean turning the surplus and excess profits into the capitalization, followed by a general distribution of the increased stock among the conspirators.

For instance, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey has a capital of $98,338,382 and a surplus of about $500,000,000.

STOP THE EXCESS PROFITS.

What, then, are we to do? Obviously there is only one thing to do, and that is to put a stop to the making of excess profits. It is not the tax that hurts. That only adds a little more to the burden of the consumers. The thing that really oppresses is the excess profit itself. For what the Government has got out of it by taxation or what the Government may get out of it by increasing the rate of taxation has been and will be very small indeed in proportion to the gross sums exacted from the people by this vicious system of profiteering which has now become a confirmed habit.

The excess-profits tax was not devised primarily as a means of raising revenue. It was intended only as a stabilizer to equalize the profits or, rather, proportion them commensurate to the expense of production in the various war industries. Another example of a worthy weapon turned to a wicked use.

Note the figures, which speak for themselves:

In the last published report of the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department, that of 1917—the figures for 1918 and 1919 are not yet tabulated—we find this startling situation:

GROWTH OF MILLIONAIRES.

In 1914 there were 2,348 millionaires in the United States. In 1917, the last date for which the figures are collected and summarized, there were 6,664—an increase of 4,316 in three years. I have divided them into classes, according to occupation. (See Table I.) There were of manufacturers 920 new millionaires made during the war. There were of farmers and stock raisers 120; of corporation officials, 716, and much to my astonishment I found that there were lawyers and judges to the number of 206 who seem to have become war millionaires. There were 27 doctors. There were 452 women in the list.

In one of President Wilson's utterances he said that a man who would make a profit out of this war would be eternally disgraced. Then, according to that, there are 4,316 men in the United States to-day who are eternally disgraced.

Another interesting table of figures is that in respect to incomes of over $5,000,000 per annum. There was one single man in the United States who earned last year a net income of $34,936,604. There was one man who earned $5,794,559.

Mr. SIMS. The gentleman means net income?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes, net income after the allowance of deductions. There were two others whose net income was $16,511,216. Mr. Speaker, I have these figures arranged in tables, and will print them in detail in my remarks. I therefore ask unanimous consent to extend and revise my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent to revise and extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GRIFFIN. There were 8 whose net incomes were over $4,000,000, and their aggregate net income was $7,000,000; there were 5 whose net incomes were over $3,000,000, and their aggregate net income was over $16,000,000; there were 24 whose net income was over $2,000,000, and whose aggregate net income was $58,000,000; there were 33 whose net incomes were between $1,500,000 and $2,000,000; and there were 67 people in the United States whose aggregate net income was $80,413,549, who had net incomes between $1,000,000 and $1,500,000 each. Those having net incomes between $500,000 and $1,000,000 were 315, and their aggregate net income was $214,000,000. In other words, there are 460 persons, less than a battalion of fighting men, in the United States whose aggregate net income was $520,835,914.

CORPORATION PROFITS.

There were 232,079 corporations in the United States which reported gross incomes of $79,540,004,981.

From this they claimed deductions of $68,809,644,680, and only paid taxes on a net income of $10,730,360,211. (This is an example of how the staggering war profits of the profiteers "disappeared" when the taxgatherer came around.)

On this amount they only paid war taxes and excess-profits taxes of $2,142,445,769, or less than 20 per cent of their net income. (See Table IV.)

If you will kindly glance at Table V you will note that manufacturing corporations led the procession in gross incomes. The Treasury report shows that this class of corporations reported a gross income of $40,437,716,989. Their net income was about one-sixth (or so they reported), and they paid a total tax of $1,326,960,480.

Wholesale and retail trade corporations came next in the gross amount of income reported. For them the figures show $19,804,255,613, but after making the deductions claimed their total net income was only $1,481,060,780, and on this they paid taxes aggregating $324,847,386.

Another interesting feature of this table is that most of the corporations paid an average tax amounting to about 20 per cent of their net income. Transportation and utilities corporations, finance corporations, and foreign corporations only paid an average of .09 per cent of their net incomes as taxes.

One of the gentlemen at the other end of the Capitol on Saturday made a speech upon the question of profiteering, and much of what might be offered in the way of statistics as to the extent of profiteering is covered quite fully in his speech. I sincerely hope that if the Members are interested enough to pursue what I have to say on this subject they will refer to Senator CAPPER's speech, where the facts and figures are given showing the outrageous extent of profiteering and gouging of the public.

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes.

Mr. SWOPE. I believe that Senator CAPPER placed the responsibility for that condition upon the Attorney General, did he not?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No; I do not think he did. I think it was Senator LENROOT who undertook to say that the conditions were as they were pictured because the Attorney General did not enforce the laws. He said: "The Attorney General is setting a few mousetraps around the country where he ought to be setting some bear traps."

Mr. SWOPE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. GRIFFIN. No.

Mr. SWOPE. I will read the statement to the gentleman.

Mr. KNUTSON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to my friend from Minnesota.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does not the gentleman think that a large part of the great cost of the war was due to the cost-plus plan adopted by the War Department?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes; I do.

Mr. KNUTSON. I know that the gentleman is always fair and at least he is willing to place the responsibility where it belongs.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will go the full length with the gentleman on that proposition. There were a great many crimes committed during the war in the name of liberty, and many a scoundrel took shelter at the altar in the sanctuary of patriotism who ought to be in jail. [Applause.]

In addition to the figures to which I have referred, I have this further interesting information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my time be extended for 10 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for an additional 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. DUNBAR. Will the gentleman kindly inform the House how much taxes were paid by these persons whose incomes amounted to between four and five hundred thousand dollars?

Mr. GRIFFIN. There were 179 whose net incomes were between $400,000 and $500,000, aggregating $79,155,111, which paid taxes aggregating $21,010,023. Under the leave which I have I shall fully answer the gentleman's inquiry. I have it all in a separate tabulation. (See Table VI.)

These startling figures recall Goldsmith's famous lines:

> Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey,
> Where wealth accumulates and men decay.

We have in this country to-day all of the conditions which are embodied in Goldsmith's prophecy. He asserted an economic truth. You have a vast accumulation of wealth beyond the dreams of avarice, and you have an utter disregard of the elementary principles of human ethics. Charity and kindness and sweetness are taken out of human life. Everybody is racing to get ahead of everybody else and "the devil take the hindmost."

HOW TO STOP IT.

How, then, shall we stop the wild orgy? Simply discourage profiteering enterprise by increasing the rate of taxation on annual net incomes in excess of $100,000 by graded steps, making the tax 100 per cent on all incomes in excess of $500,000. This is the plan I propose in H. R. 13745, for which I respectfully ask your careful study and consideration.

On net incomes between $100,000 and $150,000 I would increase the rate of taxation to 55 per cent; between $150,000 and $200,000, I would make the tax 60 per cent; between $200,000 and $300,000, 70 per cent; between $300,000 and $400,000, 80 per cent; between $400,000 and $500,000, 90 per cent; and on all net annual incomes above $500,000, I would place the tax at 100 per cent.

I do not believe that the Government should collect any taxes on incomes of individuals of over $500,000 per annum. There should be no such income. [Applause.] Their accumulation should be discouraged, and the way to discourage them is to seize them. This may seem like a paradox, but the point of my assertion is this, that if we establish a graded excess-profits tax culminating at incomes of $500,000 per annum the ambition to profiteer will be discouraged and eliminated. Under our present system of excess-profits taxation we practically abdicate the right of taxation to corporate wealth; for they confess in all their propaganda that the consumer bears ultimately the burden of such taxation. Therefore, why should we longer permit them to usurp a function of Government and practically levy taxes?

Mr. KNUTSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is it not also true that where extreme accumulated wealth is found that it is followed by extreme poverty, that they go hand in hand?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Inevitably. The total wealth of the country is only so much, and if a few men absorb more than their share there must be less to go around among the rest.

Our present system is practically a revival of the old tithe system whereby the Government let out contracts to taxgatherers, allowing them to keep a percentage of their collections. That is practically what we are doing with the corporations of this country to-day, we are allowing them to keep 40 per cent of their exactions. We let them profiteer as much as they like, accumulate vast incomes, and Uncle Sam says to them, "You let us have 40 per cent, and you can have the rest." So in that respect they become the agents of Uncle Sam to gouge the people.

Mr. KING. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Yes, sir.

Mr. KING. I wonder if it would not be better to stop the graft, if it can be done?

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is what I propose by this bill.

Mr. KING. Has the gentleman ever studied the effect upon graft which is practically caused by the methods adopted by the Federal reserve banks in financing speculators and inflating the currency?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Well, of course, this is a broad subject. It has its labyrinths and its ramifications, which all, however, lead toward one end. I am emphasizing now only one branch—one ramification. I am trying to do something to stop the partnership between the profiteers and the United States Government. I want the United States Government to say to these men, "You may make a reasonable income upon your capital invested up to $500,000, but when you exceed $500,000 per annum, then Uncle Sam takes the rest in the form of taxation." My proposition will apply to corporations as well as individuals.

Of course, I do not expect the Government to obtain any revenue out of incomes in excess of $500,000. The Government does not want a revenue out of profiteering, and net incomes in excess of $500,000 per annum are clearly unconscionable and unjust.

A CRITIC ANSWERED.

The criticism of the combined New York Sun and Herald, in a leading editorial in last Sunday's issue, is therefore decidedly amusing. The editor states that millions of dollars of revenue which now flow into the United States Treasury from the existing tax schedules applying to incomes in excess of $500,000 a year would be wiped out. It may astonish this editorial wiseacre to learn that that is precisely its object. He then proceeds to say:

Mr. GRIFFIN'S bill therefore should be officially designated on its title page as a measure to take away from the United States Government a great part of the revenue it now enjoys and to prevent it from getting millions more it seeks to obtain.

That is correct. That is not quite so evil a result as my profound critic seems to think; nor is it the unconscious effort of blind and thoughtless bill drafting. Let me emphasize, for the benefit of this gentleman who stands aghast at this measure, that it was deliberately and knowingly drawn with that very intention. And for this reason: The United States Government ought not to encourage profiteering by sharing in the excess profits of individuals or corporations beyond a certain limit, and it is thought that excess profits up to $500,000 constitute a fair and reasonable limit.

The fact that the Sun and Herald is advocating the entire abolition of the excess-profits tax makes its solicitude over the Government's interest in such taxes particularly amusing. The editor says that this measure "to a dead certainty would not produce one penny of revenue for the United States Treasury." Of course not. Our friend can gamble on that.

But listen to the reason he gives and observe his barefaced, shameless confession of corporation methods. He says:

The corporation with an income in excess of $500,000 a year would plow in, distribute in pumped-up expenses, waste, or in various ways fail to earn anything that otherwise would carry the income figures beyond the $500,000. The individual would shift, allocate, or give away sufficient of his principal to keep the income of the remainder below the dead line of confiscation.

Well, the Sun and the Herald, now combined, were always favorable to corporate wealth. The present editor evidently wears the old mantle and doubtless speaks with authority.

Uncle Sam is willing to forego his share of their pilfering; but he will insist that, instead of stealing and then wasting their income, so as to avoid the tax, as the editor so naively suggests, they will have to reduce their unconscionable profits by lowering their prices to the consumers. Such a thought never even penetrated the ponderous mind of Mr. Editor. But if he did not think of it, I think his friends will pretty soon become alive to the fact that the decentest and most honorable way to avoid the excess-profits tax is to share their profits with their customers.

THIS IS NO RADICAL ATTACK ON CAPITAL.

You will observe that I am not making any attack on capital. Capital and capitalists have their place in the economy of nature. I would not disturb a dollar of invested capital. I would even, for the sake of peace, let them get away quietly with what they have already accumulated; but I would put an end to the tyranny of money. I would not permit it to be longer used as an instrument of profiteering and oppression. I would destroy the insatiable appetite for accumulation. I think you will promptly agree with me that it is no great hardship to say to a man like Mr. X, whose annual net income in 1917, after all deductions were allowed, was $34,000,000:

"Here, sir, you take a back seat—take your fabulous capital, do what you like with it; but you must so arrange your investments that they shall not net you in excess of $500,000 a year. That is enough for any man to live on. With your power your money is an instrument of oppression. If you are allowed to use it further to pile up profits the consumers throughout this land who pay your profits are the ones who suffer, and their burden is not made lighter, I might say, by the benefactions you dispense. The people want you to take your foot off their neck. They do not want your charities—they want you to remove the blight of your hand from the industries of this land. As a matter of public policy, as a matter of self-defense, the people of the United States of America demand that your pernicious activities shall cease. You can not justly complain of their resolution. Public acts have been passed by legislative bodies limiting the amount of interest charged by pawnbrokers; laws have been passed against usury. The widow who takes the $5,000 obtained as damages for the death of her husband and invests it in a mortgage or a piece of property can not obtain more than 6 per cent interest per annum. You are not entitled to better treatment than they. Why should you be permitted to have your investments yield you percentages running into thousands and money running into millions? Public policy restrains the one, why should it not be invoked to restrain you and others like you? Usury is no longer a mere matter of percentages. It is a matter of whether great masses of capital shall, in a land abounding in wealth and natural resources, be longer permitted to absorb in the hands of a few the pitiful earnings of men, women, and children."

The responsibility is on this Congress to stop profiteering. There may be other ways; but there are none suggested which will receive the approval of the people of this country, who are naturally conservative. They bear, however, a special grudge against the profiteer. They despise him because he is merciless. During the coal strike, when the snow was on the ground and while women and children, chilled to the marrow, huddled together in squalid homes, these heartless vampires tripled the price of fuel oil, the only substitute for coal, and reaped unconscionable profits out of the misery and tears of humanity!

Pray, sir, tell me does not this House, does not mankind, owe something to them?

The old parties must hereafter exercise themselves with new issues and stop dallying with the old. They may fool each other, but they can not fool the people. Either side must take up this issue of profiteering and solve the riddle of the high cost of living or the people will rise in their wrath and solve it themselves.

UNJUST TAXATION THE ROOT OF REBELLION.

Unjust taxation is the root of rebellion. Consult your histories and you will note that it was the cause of many a struggle in ancient Greece. It revived in Rome and reechoed through the Middle Ages. It cost Charles I and Louis XVI their heads. It lost the Thirteen Colonies to Great Britain, and unless this Congress proves itself competent to meet the issue, the threat of Bolshevism, now pointing its gaunt finger at us across the seas, may prove to be a menace more substantial than a shadowy form.

The greatest problem therefore before us to-day is how to lessen the burden of taxation. Under the system we have followed in the past, it has inevitably fallen upon the consumer. To completely abolish the old and establish a new system of taxation would disorganize our finances, hamper industry, delay the process of economic readjustment. Without tearing down the old structure, we must gradually remove it stone by stone and construct on a sensible plan the new edifice.

WE MUST NOT REPEAL THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

It is for this reason that I believe we ought to begin with the excess-profits tax. We dare not repeal it altogether, so long as capital is habituated to the process of making excess profits. We must stop that process; we must check the vicious, baleful fermentation and hammer the thought into the brain of capital that speculation in the necessities of life and taking advantage of the direst needs of mankind is not a permissible form of profiteering.

INCREASING THE TAX WITHOUT LIMITING THE PROFITS WOULD BE IN VAIN.

We dare not increase the rates of taxation while putting no limit on the profits. If we should, we would simply throw the reins on the backs of the horses and tempt them to gallop away to perdition. The precipice only is the limit—then the crash.

A CASH-SALES TAX DANGEROUS.

We dare not impose a cash-sales tax, for that will only add to the burden and irritation of the consumer. And least of all should this be done while profiteering goes on unchecked. Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the thing first to be done is to check the making of and to put a limit on the amount of excess profits. Only then will the people be satisfied to bear the irritation of stamp taxes and taxes on cash sales. Doubtless if the cost of food, raiment, and shelter should go down a half, or even a third, I have no doubt the people would gladly submit to a direct tax on their purchases. But at this moment it would break the camel's back—it would be undesirable and perilous.

NINETY-EIGHTH ANNIVERSARY OF THE BIRTH OF GEN. U. S. GRANT.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, ninety-eight years ago to-day Ulysses S. Grant, commander in chief of the Union Army during the decisive battles of the Civil War and eighteenth President of the United States, was born.

My colleagues may be curious as to what impulse should have prompted me, a southern man, true to the traditions of his people, the son of a Confederate soldier, proud of his father's service and sacrifice, to offer now words of commendation for the service and in commemoration of this leader of the military forces arrayed against my own people, this chieftain who forced the surrender of the immortal Lee at Appomattox.

A few months ago by the merest accident I came across the records of Gen. Grant's testimony before the Judiciary Committee of the House in 1867. This testimony gave to me a new insight into Gen. Grant's attitude toward the southern people and a clearer understanding of the peril in which he placed himself in order to protect them at a time when he alone could do it and of the service which he rendered the Nation by that protection.

I realize fully that I am on dangerous ground to-day, but I would despise myself utterly if danger of being misunderstood should cause me, in silence, to permit this day to pass while every sentiment of gratitude and of justice bids me speak, especially as there is no legislative program to-day. [Applause.]

I speak because I am a southern man, because I love my people of the South and am grateful to those who served them in the hour of their distress. In the darkest hour which ever hung its shadows over the Southland Gen. Grant was the friend of my people and the servant of the highest interest of my Nation. [Applause.] I speak because I love my Nation and its unity, my Nation and its people everywhere. I speak the gratitude of a southern man, and in behalf of my Nation I speak the profound appreciation of one who believes himself to be a patriot, through whose patriotism there runs no line of sectional cleavage. I honor the memory of Grant not only for the magnanimity shown Lee and his army at Appomattox, but for the fact when Lincoln had fallen Gen. Grant was the only man in the Nation with the power to defend who had also the purpose and the courage to defend those who had been the military leaders of the South, those whom the South, bleeding and exhausted, could no longer defend. Gen. Grant stood between them in that terrible crisis and that breed of human jackals, not peculiar to the North, not peculiar to any time or to any people, which always follow in the footsteps of brave men in conflict. They were demanding that Lee and Johnston and others of Confederate service and fame be delivered up for humiliation and punishment. There would have been no danger if Lincoln had lived. When Richmond was captured Lincoln's attitude was epitomized in a story which he told, the point of which was expressed in the words, "Let 'em up light." Lincoln understood, but Lincoln was gone.

The South was helpless. There were many noble, generous men of position and influence in the North, but there was but one man left in all the broad confines of the Nation who both willed to protect and who had the power to protect my people and preserve for my Nation that thing of inestimable value, the possibility of that to which we have attained to-day—a Union; not of States held together by words and force merely, but a Union of people, of people so united in purpose, in interest, in love for each other, and in loyalty to a common flag that no discord can penetrate their solidarity even to test the strength of the Federal compact. [Applause.] This might have come in some other age, but Grant made that possibility for this generation.

He made it possible for us to do that which the framers of the Constitution, if they could have taken all the words of all the languages of all the ages and from them extracted all the elements of their strength and fashioned it into a declaration of perpetual, indissoluble unity, could not have done. He made it possible for us to put the cement into the sand, to supply that which among a free people must constitute the real cohesive element in government.

We southern people recognize Grant as a great general, but it was not in military conflict that he was greatest. Gen. Grant was a great military leader at Appomattox, but he was greater when the battle was over. [Applause.]

This is the picture: Sheridan was in front of Lee's decimated, hungry, exhausted army. Meade was on his rear and right flank, and Ord on the south. Grant knew that the end had come. On April 7, 1865, he opened negotiations with Lee with this remarkable communication. I quote:

GENERAL: The result of the last week must convince you of the hopelessness of further resistance on the part of the Army of Northern Virginia in this struggle. I feel that it is so, and regard it as my duty to shift from myself the responsibility of any further effusion of blood by asking of you the surrender of that portion of the Confederate States Army known as the Army of Northern Virginia.

Lee replied with the request for "the terms you will offer on condition of its surrender," on the same date. On April 8 Grant replied:

I would say that, peace being my great desire, there is but one condition I would insist upon, namely, that the men and officers surrendered shall be disqualified for taking up arms against the Government of the United States until properly exchanged. I will meet you, or will designate officers to meet any officers you may name for the same purpose, at any point agreeable to you, for the purpose of arranging definitely the terms upon which the surrender of the Army of Northern Virginia will be received.

In reply Lee declined to meet Gen. Grant solely "with a view to surrender the Army of Northern Virginia."

On April 9 Gen. Grant replied that he had no authority to treat on the subject of peace.

At sunrise on the 9th Gordon had found himself unable to open up the way for the retreating army, and Gen. Lee dispatched the following note to Gen. Grant:

GENERAL: I received your note this morning on the picket line, whither I had come to meet you and ascertain definitely what terms were embraced in your proposition of yesterday with reference to the surrender of this army. I now request an interview in accordance with the offer contained in your letter of yesterday for that purpose.

The desired interview was given by Gen. Grant. The two commanders met in the village of Appomattox Court House.

It is probable that no scene like that was ever before witnessed. In order to appreciate how remarkable it was we must bear in mind that not only was the army of Gen. Lee about to be surrendered, together with its general, one of the greatest military geniuses of all times, but the South had reached the end of its resources. Grant was the absolute master of the situation. His hands were free, his will was supreme. He could have driven the dagger of humiliation into the heart of his defenseless foe, but instead he voluntarily stipulated, I quote:

The officers to give their individual paroles not to take up arms against the United States until properly exchanged, and each company or regimental commander to give a like parole for the men of his command. The officers to retain their side arms, private horses, and baggage. This done, each officer and man will be allowed to return to his home (note this language), not to be disturbed by United States authority so long as they observe their parole and the laws in force where they may reside.

These terms were made with Lincoln's approval. In addition to these terms Grant instructed his commissioners designated to receive the surrender of Lee's army to permit the private soldiers to take away the horses to reestablish themselves on their farms and directed that the hungry men being paroled should receive the rations which Lee requested for them.

During the whole of the negotiations those who were present tell us, and so does Gen. Grant himself, that Lee was compelled more than once to direct the attention of Gen. Grant to the business which had called them together. On that occasion this rugged man of many battles demonstrated a tender deference and a profound respect and sympathy for Gen. Lee which appeals to the gratitude and to the affectionate regard for Grant of every true southern man [applause]; and not only do I feel that gratitude as a southern man, but as a citizen of this Republic who has never felt estranged from it, I realize that Gen. Grant's conduct on that occasion, and especially during the two fateful years which followed, more than anything else has made it possible for the hearts of the southern people to thrill, as now they do, with real vital love for the selfsame flag which waved in final victory that day over Appomattox's bloody field. The facts permit not a shadow of doubt. [Applause.]

That day, when the battle was ended, and the Stars and Bars, the proud emblem of the Confederacy, was furled forever above the broken fragments of the lost cause—that was the day and the occasion which challenged Grant in magnitude of possibility of service, not merely to the distressed, helpless people of the South, but to our common country, as no given battle had challenged him. He arose to the full limit of the possibilities of that day, and in so doing reached a height sublime among the servants of his country which no man since his day has had the opportunity to measure up to. [Applause.]

I am not unmindful of the fact that no true soldier unnecessarily could have humiliated Lee at Appomattox or failed in consideration for the brave men who surrendered with him there. Lee challenged, his character and military genius compelled, respect and sympathy from every brave man, and no man unafraid to die for what he believed to be right could have failed in honor to the hungry, naked, brave-hearted men who were with Lee at the last. But Grant's treatment of Lee and his men at Appomattox was more than that. Only the bravest of the brave, inspired by true nobility of soul, could have done all that Grant did that day. I know of no parallel in the military history of the world. [Applause.]

But Grant's service to my people, and his defense of them did not end there; time will not permit the tracing of this heroic figure through the maze of the two terrible years—terrible for my people and dangerous for the Nation—when Grant practically alone, with his prestige and power and at the peril of their loss, defended the men who had surrendered to him. [Applause.]

But I can not close without giving you another glimpse of Grant. A scene which properly to portray would challenge the greatest genius of a Shakespeare. This is the setting:

The conflict between Congress and President Johnson had reached a crisis. Hot burned the flame of public passion. The Judiciary Committee of the House, laying the predicate for the President's impeachment, called Gen. Grant as a witness. He faced a committee of northern men. To the North were the victors; to the South the vanquished. All that Grant had ever received had come from the North. From the northern viewpoint the South had been in rebellion and its people traitors.

President Johnson from many sources had been criticized for not having brought the southern leaders to trial and to punishment. That had become a definite subissue in the general controversy. I shall ask to be printed in connection with these remarks excerpts from Gen. Grant's testimony on that occasion, and as you read, if you will, having in mind the temper of those times and Gen. Grant's peculiar circumstances, you will see him before that committee, and as he was during those times, standing out in colossal proportions, as heroic a figure as the history of any age has produced, and you will all see clearly how great a debt the South owes, and now, since the smoke of conflict has rolled away, and we can see the truth, you will see how great a debt a reunited people owe to this man whose natal day we celebrate.

In properly estimating Gen. Grant's service, not to the sections—North and South—but to a Nation reunited and conscious of the value of its national solidarity, it is necessary to bear in mind that the southern people at the time they seceded from the Union and at the time of the surrender believed they had a constitutional right to secede. They were conscious that in responding to the call of their respective States they had responded to the impulse of patriotism and not of treason. They believed their invaders and not themselves guilty of wrong.

Regardless of opinions on the point, it matters not such a people so believing, if ever to become dependable, helpful allies of those against whom such belief is held, must have something around which to build their allegiance. Suppression can not make a people dependable; coercion is ineffective in that regard. Love alone can do it, and love is not a thing which can be put on and taken off at will, like a coat. It must be inspired by the object toward which it is directed. Patriotism is not of the head; it is of the heart. [Applause.]

When the poor, hungry Confederate soldiers rode to homes where death and desolation reigned they were on old horses and mules, some of them were, which Gen. Grant had allowed them to take. They told the people that Gen. Grant had permitted them to have these animals. That fact, at that time, balanced with mighty weight against the load of bitterness and hatred with which the heart of the country was laden. We can not estimate the possibility of that act for the future good understanding between the sections. And when they learned in the South that Gen. Grant seemed sad and depressed, as Grant himself states when he was receiving Lee's surrender, and the soldiers told the people at home that Grant stopped the firing of the cannon in celebration of Lee's surrender, and then when Grant with his mighty influence and unconquerable purpose defended their leaders against the violation of the terms of their parole there was put into the bitterness of the souls of the southern people which they felt against the North, at an hour when it would be most effective, this antidote of magnanimity from Gen. Grant, the military chieftain of the North. [Applause.]

I am glad, and so are the southern people glad, that the institution of slavery is gone. The price for its riddance was terrible; that it had to be paid is a reflection upon the leadership of that time, but that price, if nothing else would have sufficed, was not too great to rid ourselves of that thing which was destroying the superstructure and the very foundation of our civilization. [Applause.]

I will not apologize for the Confederate service of my father nor the act of secession on the part of the Southern States. Neither will the southern people apologize, nor need they apologize, but I am glad beyond words to express, and the southern people are glad, that the Union is not divided. [Applause.]

Wonderful history of a wonderful people. Here I, the son of a Confederate soldier, stand in my place in the Federal Congress. About me there are my colleagues from the South, practically all of whom, except the grand old man of North Carolina, Maj. STEDMAN, who himself wore the gray, are sons of Confederate soldiers, and now, in very truth and in fact, without reservation or qualification, we hold all we have, every drop of our blood, dedicated to that flag, glorious emblem of a united people. We, my brethren, North and South, by this achievement write a new chapter in the history of the world. [Applause.]

During the Great War just ended, in so far as I know, no suspicion of disloyalty in a single instance attached itself to a Confederate soldier or to the son or daughter of a Confederate soldier. I am proud of that fact, and I challenge the history of the world for its parallel. How much Grant helped only a southern man can appreciate.

I saw these old men, with the fire of patriotism shining through their age-dimmed eyes, bring their sons and their grandsons to the flag of this Nation and sending them forth to die in its defense. I claim for my people no superior merit. My father taught me profound respect for the brave soldiers who came down from the North. My own association has taught me the worth and the sense of justice of northern people.

Ours is not to forget but to understand, not to forgive but to measure by the correct standards. One of the most remarkable spectacles in human history—one of the most difficult for an outsider to understand—is that of these old soldiers of the South, kindling the enthusiasm, and leading the procession of the sons of the South, marching to the defense of the same flag which Grant had carried at Appomattox. I would not detract from their glory. I am proud of them beyond words to express. [Applause.] The Nation ought to be proud of them. But I know how much Grant helped; I wonder if the North realizes what difficulties lay about the Confederate soldiers, unheeded, and what appeals to prejudice, involved in their experiences, fell on unresponsive ears, in that hour when the Nation called. Will you not go back through the intervening years to that day when the politicians of the two sections had wrought their work of disunion and view the situation from the viewpoint of the Southern soldier. Then you can realize what Grant did. The Southern soldiers faced then the choice and only the choice of fighting with their States to repel invasion or of joining the invaders of their homes. They had not originated the idea of secession. It was declared in this Chamber first in 1811 by Mr. Quincy, of Massachusetts. These statements are not made either in criticism or apology. They are just facts—facts which constitute the historical background and make understandable the psychology of the South and the importance of what Grant did. The first representative assembly to declare the right of a State to judge of the Constitution and to act upon its independent, sovereign judgment was the Hartford convention, held in 1814.

Mr. Winthrop, of Massachusetts, whom the people of that State sent to the seat of the great Webster, redeclared this right just 16 years before the Southern States seceded.

In 1843 it was declared by a group of northern statesmen—I quote:

> We hesitate not to say that annexation (of Texas) effected by any act or proceedings of the Federal Government or any of its departments would be identical with dissolution. * * * Not only inevitably result in dissolution of the Union but fully to justify it, and we not only assert that the people of the free States ought not to submit to this but we say with confidence they would not submit to it—

Note the language would justify a dissolution of the Union, and—> the people of the free States ought not and would not submit.

In other words, they ought to and would secede.

The States represented by these gentlemen did not secede, probably because it was beginning to become evident then that the section of which they were a part was coming into control of the Federal Government. But they did declare the identical doctrine of the southern secessionists, for the putting into execution of which Southern States 17 years later were invaded and ravaged by the States which these gentlemen represented at the time they signed this declaration. That is not merely a southern contention; that is a fact. This address was signed by John Quincy Adams, ex-President of the United States; Seth M. Gates, of New York; William Slade, of Vermont; William Calhoun, of Massachusetts; Joshua R. Giddings, of Ohio; Sherlock J. Andrews, of Ohio; Nathaniel B. Borden, of Massachusetts; Thomas C. Chittenden, of New York; John Mattocks, of Vermont; Christopher Morgan, of New York; Joshua M. Howard—probably J. M. Howard—of Michigan; Victory Birdseye, of New York; Hiland Hall, of Vermont, all Members of the National Congress at the time they signed the address. This was the historical background.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HUDSPETH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that my colleague be given 10 mintues more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that his colleague may have an additional 10 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, the Confederate soldiers were conscious of the fact that they sought no conquest nor the exercise of coercion. They sought only to withdraw from the Northern States, between which and themselves there had developed unending bitterness and controversy, only the right of self-determination and self-government. They sought only to exercise a right which northern men had often declared to exist, and for which declaration no northern statesman had ever been repudiated by his constituency. I mean no offense. These things may be observed not only from the southern but from the general viewpoint.

Down upon the South came the host of the North with the sword in one hand and the torch in the other, for such are the instruments of war. The flag of this host was the flag of the Nation, the selfsame flag to which in the late war these old soldiers made the supreme contribution. When they made it there were upon their bodies the scars inflicted in the name of that flag. In its name as fair a land as ever the sun shone on, their own, their native land, had been made desolate.

When the fortunes of war had written its decree against them, that flag waved over their country the emblem of conquest and suppression. Beneath that flag the "carpetbagger," the agent and representative of the National Government, pillaged this people in safe protection. No commission of restoration had ever borne to them the spirit of helpful human sympathy to build again in the ravaged theater of war.

The hand of the Federal Government when extended in their direction held no bounty, it was the hand of the tax gatherer, by the authority and power of that flag enforcing contributions from their poverty for those who had brought to them a visitation of death and a judgment of subjugation.

In a sense they had been ostracized, and for years after the Civil War traitor and treason had been the characterization which many of those who presumed to speak the Nation's voice uttered with reference to them; and yet, when the Nation called, I saw these old soldiers fight their way through these barriers, bringing with them all they had, their money and their young men, bone of their bone and blood of their blood, to lay upon the altar of the National Government. I want to emphasize that I claim for them no merit which I am not willing to concede to the Union soldier; and in that statement, which I make without reservation, I pay to the Union soldier the highest compliment which lies within the possibility of my command of words. The very qualities which made it possible for them to do this would have made it impossible if Grant, instead of doing as he did at Appomattox, had reversed his conduct, and if he had failed in his protection of Lee in that tragic hour in the Nation's life when passion sat in the seat of justice and Lee, the idol of the South, had been judicially murdered.

I do not want to speak extravagantly of Gen. Grant on this occasion. It would be absurd to claim for him the major part of the credit for the attitude which the South sustains toward the National Government. The Southern people and the Northern people have wrought the situation; but I do not exaggerate when I declare that Gen. Grant preserved for us the possibility of doing that in this generation. Nobody will charge me with being sectional or intensely partisan, but as I search my own heart I declare it to be my deliberate judgment that if, in addition to what has been done to the South in the name of the National Government, Grant had not in its name done as he did at the time of the "surrender" and the things had been done which Grant prevented, the great-grandsons of the Confederate soldiers would have been in the Nation, but not of it. That is my deliberate judgment.

I am grateful to Gen. Grant not only for what he did for my people of the South, but I am grateful to him for preserving for me and my people the possibility of feeling toward our Nation as we feel to-day. That was his great service. He preserved that possibility. I want my people of the South to see him, and I want the Nation to see him in the great crisis, sublimely magnificent in his humanity, in his understanding, in his sense of justice, and in his dauntless courage.

And may I not be pardoned if I confess gratification that incidentally we are brought to where a close-up view of the old soldiers of the South may be had, where, from their viewpoint, the vision may run back through the years of conflict and reconstruction, and we may see them when the Nation called breaking through the entanglements of wrongs inflicted and wrongs imagined, of conflicting sentiments and dark uncertainty, into the clear light of a newborn national patriotism, bringing into their hands the resources of the South and about them the fighting men of the South. [Applause.]

Some day some man on that side of the aisle who comes from the Northland, with the spirit of Lincoln and the courage of Grant, will stand in his place here and will tell the world of the obscured facts of history which place the soldiers of the Southern Confederacy, as such, high among the world's patriots and heroes. We of both sections have too long hidden the clarifying and prejudice-eradicating facts behind the curtain of sectionalism. One people we were, one people we are and ever shall be, led at one time by circumstances into a great tragedy and placed in that conflict by the accident of environment upon the sides which we respectively occupied. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. LONGWORTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. How different might have been the story, gentlemen, if Gen. Grant at Appomattox, instead of applying the balm of sympathy, a sort of first-aid to the terrible wounds of mind and soul, more terrible in some respects than their wounds of body, had driven the dagger of humiliation into the souls of those men who felt then that they had sought to act within their rights and had been invaded and pillaged and coerced by the North for exercising a right which many of the northern leaders had often asserted and threatened to resort to.

How differently might have been the story if Gen. Grant had not held back the hands of President Johnson from the person of Lee, Joseph E. Johnston, and others of Confederate service and fame until the sense of justice of the North could break away from the grip of prejudice which the war had fastened upon both sections.

Grant was not a great President. He had no training and no fitness for the service. As President he was the victim of evil times and of evil men, but as Commander in Chief of the Federal Army he saved the States from political disunion, and then by his magnanimity and courage he made it possible for us, for you, the sons of Union soldiers, and for us, sons of Confederate soldiers, and for our fathers, to form now so solid a Union among ourselves, in purpose, in sympathy, in mutual interest, in common love for a common country and a common flag that no sectional discord can ever again reach through even to test the strength of the Federal compact. This is glory enough and service enough for any man.

As the son of a Confederate soldier, proud of the service and the sacrifice of his father, as one who believes himself to be a patriot through whose patriotism there runs no line of sectional cleavage, with gratitude for the service which Gen. Grant rendered to our common country, with gratitude for his magnanimity to my people of the South in the hour of their darkest distress, and for his protection of them in the hour of their utter helplessness, I have asked the privilege of making this statement on this anniversary of the birth of Gen. Grant. [Loud applause, the Members rising.]

[Excerpts from Gen. Grant's testimony before the House Judiciary, July 18, 1867.]

* * * * * * *

Q. * * *.—A. * * * I frequently had to intercede for Gen. Lee and other paroled officers, on the ground that their parole, so long as they obeyed the laws of the United States, protected them from arrest and trial. The President at that time occupied exactly the reverse grounds, viz, that they should be tried and punished. He wanted to know when the time would come that they should be punished. I told him not so long as they obeyed the laws and complied with the stipulation. That was the ground I took.

Q. Did you not also insist that that applied as well to the common soldiers?—A. Of course it applied to everyone who took the parole. * * *

Q. You looked on that in the nature of a parole and held that they could only be tried when they violated that parole?—A. Yes; that was the view I took of the question.

Q. That is your view still?—A. Yes, sir; unquestionably.

Q. Did you understand that to apply to Gen. Lee?—A. Certainly.

Q. That was your understanding of the arrangement which you made with Gen. Lee?—A. That was my understanding of an arrangement which I gave voluntarily. * * *

Q. You considered that the like terms were given by Gen. Sherman to the armies which surrendered to him?—A. Yes, sir; to all the armies that surrendered after that.

Q. And you held that so long as they kept their parole of honor and obeyed the laws they were not subject to be tried by courts?—A. That was my opinion. I will state here that I am not quite certain whether I am being tried or who is being tried by the questions asked.

Q. Did the President insist that Gen. Lee should be tried for treason?—A. He contended for it.

Q. And you claimed to him that the parole which Gen. Lee had given would be violated in such trial?—A. I did. I insisted on it that Gen. Lee would not have surrendered his army and given up all their arms if he had supposed that after surrender he was going to be tried for treason and hanged. * * *

Q. Did the President argue that question with you?—A. There was not much argument about it; it was merely assertion.

Q. After you had expressed your opinion upon it, did he coincide with you?—A. No, sir; not then. He afterwards got to agreeing with me on that subject. * * *

* * * * * * *

A. The conversations were frequent after the inauguration of Mr. Johnson. I can not give the time. He seemed to be anxious to get at the leaders to punish them. He would say that the leaders of the rebellion must be punished, and that treason must be made odious. He cared nothing for the men in the ranks—the common men. He would let them go, for they were led into it by the leaders.

Q. Did you not give your opinion at all that amnesty ought to be granted to those people to any extent?—A. I know that I was in favor of some proclamation of the sort, and perhaps I may have said so. It was necessary to do something to establish governments and civil law there. I wanted to see that done, but I do not think I ever pretended to dictate what ought to be done.

Q. Did you not advise?—A. I do not think I ever did. I have given my opinions, perhaps as to what has been done, but I do not think I advised any course myself any more than that I was very anxious to see something done to restore civil government in those States.

Q. Did you recommend certain generals of the Confederate Army to the President for pardon who fell within the exemptions?—A. Yes, sir. I recommended Gen. Longstreet, I think, a year and a half ago; and, although I can not recollect the names of anybody else, I think I recommended several others.

Q. Do you recollect recommending J. G. French, a graduate of West Point?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What part did he take in the rebellion?—A. He was a brigadier general.

Q. Was he a graduate of West Point?—A. He was; and a classmate of mine.

Q. Do you recollect recommending the pardon of George H. Stuart?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. What part did he take in the Confederate service?—A. He was a general, and commanded a brigade or division. He took no very conspicuous part.

A. Was he a graduate of West Point?—A. I think so.

Q. He was not a classmate of yours?—A. No, sir; he came along after me.

Q. Do you recollect P. D. Roddy, said to be a rebel brigadier general?—A. Yes, sir; I do not recollect what my indorsement was in Roddy's case, but I know that if I had it to do over again I would recommend his pardon very quickly, and I presume I did so. If he is not pardoned yet, I would be very glad to sign a recommendation for him now.

Q. Did you ever advise the pardon of Gen. Lee?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Were you ever consulted on that question by the President?—A. I do not recollect having had any conversation with him on the subject. I think it probable that I recommended verbally the pardon of Gen. Johnston immediately after the surrender of his army, on account of the address he delivered to his army. I thought it in such good tone and spirit that we should distinguish between him and others who did not appear so well. I recollect speaking of that and saying that I should be glad if Gen. Johnston received his pardon on account of the manly manner in which he addressed his troops.

Q. By the Chairman: You supposed his pardon would have a good effect?—A. Yes; I thought it would have a good effect. I am not sure whether I spoke on the subject to the Secretary of War or to the President.

Q. By Mr. Woodbridge: What did you mean by saying that the President's views afterwards changed?—A. I meant to say that while I was contending for the rights which those rebel paroled soldiers had, he was insisting on it that they should be punished. My remark was confined to that particular subject.

Q. By Mr. Thomas: You have stated your opinion as to the rights and privileges of Gen. Lee and his soldiers; did you mean that to include any political rights?—A. I have explained that I did not.

Q. Was there any difference of opinion on that point between yourself and President Johnson at any time?—A. On that point there was no difference of opinion; but there was as to whether the parole gave him any privileges or rights.

Q. By Mr. Eldridge: He claiming that it did not and you claiming that it did?—A. He claiming that the time must come when they could be tried and punished, and I claiming that the time could not come except by a violation of their parole. I claimed that I gave them no political privileges, but that I had a right, as military commander, to arrange terms of surrender which should protect the lives of those prisoners. I believe it is conceded by everybody that I had that right. I know that Mr. Lincoln conceded it at that time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. FREAR] is recognized for 30 minutes under the order of the House.

SOLDIERS' COMPENSATION ACT.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, I believe I may fairly present the grateful thanks of those on this side of the aisle for the splendid eulogy on Gen. Grant on this his birthday to which we have just listened from the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. He did not emphasize, however, one proposition which entered so strongly into Gen. Grant's action, I believe. And that was Grant and Lee had their training in the same school, knew each other as only two men can who are close colleagues, found themselves at arms with each other, and yet knew each other intimately and trusted each other. That may have been the reason why Grant was willing and was ready to give what he did to Lee and his army at Appomattox. Two great men, men of equally high standing, two great soldiers, they equally reflected credit upon their common country. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Texas, who has just spoken so eloquently, spoke to you as the representative of the South, as the son of a Confederate soldier. Let me speak as one whose father spent three years and a half in the Union Army trying to bring about the result at Appomattox. More to the point, my boys went to your State—Texas—with our Wisconsin troops, and at Waco camp our northern soldiers spent months to fit themselves for the fighting they did on the Marne and at Chateau-Thierry, fighting at the side of your boys, and thereby cementing for all time the link between the South and the North for a common flag. [Applause.] And these sentiments come fortunately to us, I believe, at this hour.

Mr. Speaker, we have had some very interesting discussions this afternoon by the gentlemen from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH], from Mr. GARNER, of Texas, and others on one of the most important bills that has ever been before this Congress, with the exception of those passed during the war, a bill that appropriates approximately $1,500,000,000 to carry to the boys who did the fighting over there, your boys and ours, some little evidence of the gratitude which our people feel toward them.

In addition, there has been a disposition—I do not think a serious one—on the part of gentlemen in the House, possibly on both sides of the aisle, to make political capital, shall I say? No; but to drag partisanship into the question, and we can not afford either on one side of the aisle or the other at this time to allow that to happen. The question is too large, and I desire in the few remarks that I have to make to confine myself almost entirely to the economic side of this proposition. I do not intend anything to be said by myself that shall reflect upon anyone, either of the Committee on Ways and Means, of which I am a member, or upon any other Member of the House. I am going to take it for granted that every man, like Lee and Grant in sixty-five, is now acting for the best interests of the country and that we propose at this time, so far as we can do so, to get a bill that will meet the best judgment of the House and of the country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to have those who are interested in this subject examine the tables of comparative taxation in Great Britain and in this country, and other tables that I have gone to the trouble to prepare with the aid of the best experts in the country, that are recognized authorities from the Treasury, who aided in the preparation of tables submitted. I believe they are illuminating, and bear out the fairness of the proposition which I wish briefly to present to you.

May I first speak of another matter? Reflection has been made in the House occasionally on the efforts toward economy of the majority leader of the House. I trust the reflection has not been intentional. Let me say that his task has been a very difficult problem, as you gentlemen well know, because the burden has been on your shoulders in the past. He filled a difficult position to begin with; and I think you will all admit, as we must on our side, that he is doing more than we could ever have hoped for. He has undoubtedly tried as best he could to perform his difficult duty. I say this without suggestion from anyone on this side. He has tried to bring about better economic conditions in this Congress; and it is difficult, of course, as we all know, because we have been in an atmosphere of extravagance brought about by the war. He has compelled a sentiment to develop here in behalf of economy, and he has tried to persuade us to meet the necessities of the Treasury.

Again, take the steering committee, which in like manner has not escaped criticism. I know, as a matter of fact, that that committee has in every way possible worked to that same end—a prevention of unnecessary public expenditures. That committee embraces men of the very highest standing in this House, and they have tried in every way possible to prevent extravagance in government while they are in the position they now occupy; and the benefit of their judgment—of men who have made a success in life—is worth more than we can appreciate. In all frankness, there is not a Member on the floor of this House who would not willingly receive as his compensation what the largest business man among them receives to-day. No one can justly cast aspersions on a single one of those Members, and I think the House and the country are fortunate in having them where they are to-day. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, the situation that confronts us is this: A bill is now in the making—it has not yet been made. That bill is being formed in committee. At first we were charged on this Republican side of the aisle with a purpose to smother the bill. I do not believe that was the intention of any Member on the Republican side, and to-day I do not believe it is the purpose of any Member on the Democratic side. We differ as to the method of taxation in raising the money. And let me say that the aisle does not stand between us on that. There are Members on both sides of the aisle who believe that this money should be raised largely by income taxes, and there are those on the Republican side of the aisle who believe that if the measure that has been urged here as a substitute is put through, which provides for a large retroactive income tax, it would not only ditch the bill but it would bankrupt many interests in this country. I am speaking with perfect frankness, and that idea also comes from men who are financiers not on this floor.

Mr. TREADWAY. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman please particularize a little more as to which bill he refers to as being likely to ditch the bill if enacted as a substitute?

Mr. FREAR. I refer to the opinion of reputable men regarding the substitute which will be offered on a motion to recommit. I am opposed to any proposition that includes what is called the "sales tax." That, in my judgment, is a dangerous proposition. I am sincere in that. The members of my committee know my attitude, and when Members say what was the unanimous disposition of the committee, they will all be free to say that I reserved the right in committee and reserve it now to differ on the sales-tax plan, because it is not a political proposition in any way. The Republican members of the committee have been honest and faithful, and I want to bear testimony to that, because they have worked hard in perfecting the details of this soldiers' compensation bill; they have worked faithfully during both morning and afternoon sessions, and I have no doubt the Republican Members will, if it is deemed desirable, take the Democratic Members into their confidence in securing as strong a bill as possible, although I do not know exactly what the parliamentary situation will be.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. GARNER. Before the gentleman gets away from that I wish to ask him a question. Does he believe that next Friday, when we take this matter up for consideration, there is going to be a real discussion as to the various provisions of the bill, with a view to meeting objections and adjusting differences of opinion?

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman asks me a question which, of course, I, as a member of the committee, have no power to decide. The possibility of failing to have harmony at that time causes me to speak at this time in the hope that some portion of what I have proposed may be placed in the bill, which is only tentatively prepared at this time. I have no desire to express opinions in a personal way at this time on the parliamentary situation, and it is only in the hope that part of my proposal may be adopted that I now refer to it.

Mr. GARNER. What I referred to is the prospect that on next Thursday the committee will be called together to consider the soldiers' bill. Does not the gentleman know that when that meeting takes place that bill will already have been prepared, and the Members will be called in simply to report it?

Mr. FREAR. The gentleman from Texas, who I think is one of the very able Members of this House, will pardon me for a personal remark. I shall be very glad in replying to his query to state a conversation which I overheard between the chairman of the commitee, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY], and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], in which the gentleman from Texas said, "I know what you are going to do, and you will put it over; and if we had the handling of it we would do the same thing." [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. GARNER. I want to say to the gentleman that I do not recall that exact conversation. [Laughter.]

Mr. FREAR. I am going to say by way of apology that I do not know how apt a pupil the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. FORDNEY] may be, so I can not answer in advance as to what the course of procedure may be; but I desire at this time to present briefly what I wish to have you gentlemen consider, on both sides of the aisle, when the bill comes up for framing, because it has not been completed yet.

I will be glad to be interrupted in regard to this after I have finished reading the suggestions I have to make, which have come through discussion with some of the ablest tax experts in the Treasury Department, who have aided me, and I feel that their judgment is of especial value at this time. Some of them think the proposition that has been offered as a substitute here will be a very serious business proposition for the country, while others among these experts fear that this sales tax, so called, is a very doubtful economic proposition for the country. We must determine the policy in view of that fact. I desire to offer a solution. I do not know how far it will go in the final framing of the bill, but, gentlemen, I will be very glad to have you listen to it:

"First. Increase the normal personal income tax for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921 to rates imposed and collected for the year 1918; that is, increase the present rates of 4 to 8 per cent to 6 to 12 per cent. This will produce approximately $170,000,000 a year, or $500,000,000 for the three years. It will produce nearly five times as much as the proposed committee increase."

No good reason can be offered why the law should not be enacted.

If there is any question about that, let me suggest this: The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] presented the authority of the Supreme Court to the effect that that court in a specific ruling held to be constitutional the retroactive act which reached to a prior year. I am speaking of the years 1919, 1920, and 1921 contained in this first proposition. And let me say that by raising the tax to the 1918 rate it will then be far below the British rate, as I propose to show.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think the gentleman made an inadvertent statement when he said this would produce five times as much income as the tax that was proposed by the bill. That would produce $130,000,000, we are informed by the experts. If so, his provision would produce $650,000,000.

Mr. FREAR. The Treasury experts stated yesterday in my presence, and in the presence of the gentleman, that the income-tax proposals here would raise $110,000,000, according to the memorandum I hold. Now, this will raise $500,000,000. However, that may have been for one year; and if so, the total to be raised by the committee plan in the income-tax increase would be $220,000,000 for the two years, or less than one-half of my plan.

I think it is of interest to say with regard to the British rates that the American rates are not one-half what the British rates are up to $100,000 a year. The point where the rates cross and where the heavy rates begin under our extra tax comes at $250,000 income a year.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Certainly; I yield to the gentleman from Wyoming.

Mr. MONDELL. As I understand it, the estimate of $500,000,000 to be raised under his plan is an estimate of the amount that would be raised in the three years?

Mr. FREAR. In the three years of 1919, 1920, and 1921.

Mr. MONDELL. Now, the estimate of $110,000,000 under the plan that the committee had under consideration—was that a three-year estimate also, or only a one-year estimate?

Mr. FREAR. I have the amount here, and I believe it is for one year. If so, the committee plan will raise $200,000,000 in the two years proposed by the committee at this rate. In other words, the plan I propose would raise two and one-half times as much.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There is really no controversy between the gentleman and myself, except that the gentleman was considering a three-year program and I a one-year program.

Mr. FREAR. That is right. In any event, this proposition which I have brings a much larger return. But it is not mine. It is the proposition that the Congress of the United States adopted, and you put it in force in 1918, and I am only asking you to reenact it, because it is reasonable and just as a part of this bill.

As I said, if you will study the comparison of rates between Great Britain and ourselves, taking, for instance, incomes of $20,000 annually, our rate to-day is 9.95 per cent. In Great Britain it is 34.06 per cent. On $50,000 annual income our rate to-day is 18.38 per cent. In Great Britain the rate is 41.88 per cent; and, as the expert stated to us, the taxing conditions are comparatively the same. Although the difference in taxation rates exists, he says conditions are substantially the same in effect.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The gentleman is aware that our rates on the higher incomes are far higher than those in Great Britain?

Mr. FREAR. Yes. Our rates on the higher incomes pass at the $250,000 annual income figure. And let me say this, gentlemen: Taking the basis of those who have talked before here to-day, that $50,000 a year is the income of the average millionaire in the country, when we get up to $250,000 a year income that represents a fortune of five millions, and it will not be a great hardship if we do take a good deal of that annual income of $250,000, because he has got $5,000,000 capital left.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Let me speak first of this, which must appeal to every Member, if he uses his ordinary gray matter: When it is said that a man has not got the money to pay a retroactive tax of one year, that he has spent the money or invested it, of course that is true; but is not it true that the average Member has to make preparation in advance for the payment of his taxes every year? We propose to allow the 1919 and 1920 tax to be cumulative. If you can not make provision to pay taxes on your house, the State sells your house. The tax official comes right into the market and offers your house for sale at auction, and he makes a sale if you do not have the money. You can put a mortgage on your house if you want to, or you can raise it in any way you choose, but you must raise the money. That is the situation with small householders all over the country to-day. So, after you have made your income, if you have invested the surplus to be taxed, if you have put it into capital, I care not how you have used it, you have had it, and why should you not pay it back in 1920, the same as you paid it in 1918? Now I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I wanted to ask the gentleman whether he has the figures of the English income tax on £100,000, or $500,000 per annum?

Mr. FREAR. I have that before me. On an annual income of $500,000 our rate is 66.63 per cent, and the tax rate of Great Britain is 51.44 per cent. However, I desire to offer a further statement on that point. Let me read from an Associated Press dispatch:

LONDON, April 19.

The feature of the budget statement delivered in the House of Commons to-day by J. Austin Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, was the revelation of the country's bounding revenue and a surprise by the chancellor in his announcement of the purpose to raise the excess-profits tax 60 per cent, when it had been expected this tax would be abolished and a substitute tax proposed.

There is much more of it in regard to other increases in taxes, and I will put it in the RECORD.

Let me come to the second proposition I have to offer:

"Second. Extend the normal tax to dividends received by individuals from corporations for the years 1920 and 1921. This will produce about $240,000,000 a year and $480,000,000 for the two years."

The objection offered to that is you have taxed them once. Yes; so you tax the house, and when you take the rent you tax the rent as a part of the income. The Treasury experts asked why that was not put into the original law, and I can not answer why. That is the second proposition and ought to be adopted now.

The third proposition is:

"Tax stock dividends for the three years 1919, 1920, and 1921 at 25 per cent—approximately the rate that would be imposed had not the Supreme Court ruled that the tax on such dividends in the 1918 revenue act was unconstitutional. This tax would produce approximately $150,000,000, principally from the dividends declared during the year 1920."

It has been suggested that there may be a question as to the constitutionality of that provision. There are various methods by which it can be reached by taxing the corporations direct which have been declaring such tremendous stock dividends as were mentioned by the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], and by Senator CAPPER in the Senate. Are we going to be blind to this method of avoiding the income-tax law? I think we ought to make an effort to tax these corporations, and it ought to be done now, and that will bring $150,000,000 for the years of 1919, 1920, and 1921.

Mr. TREADWAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. TREADWAY. Is not that proposition before the Ways and Means Committee now?

Mr. FREAR. It has been before the Ways and Means Committee for months, and I say that we ought to put it through without delay in this bill at this session.

Mr. TREADWAY. The gentleman does not mean months, for the decision of the Supreme Court was rendered not long ago.

Mr. FREAR. It has been before the Ways and Means Committee since the decision, which was rendered early in March—several weeks instead of months. It seems to me that it should be put through this session. There is not a ghost of a chance of this stock dividend tax getting through the Senate this session unless we add it to this bill, and I think we ought to show that it is our honest purpose to tax stock dividends. Again, my position, based on Treasury expert opinion, is that these dividends should be taxed at 25 per cent, whereas the bill that is slumbering in the committee only provides for 15 per cent tax.

The fourth proposition is:

"Fourth. Double the tax on automobiles of over $1,000, trucks, parts, and accessories. This will produce $200,000,000 for two years, 1920 and 1921. The present rate of taxes is 2 per cent on trucks and 5 per cent on automobiles and accessories, including tires."

If you are going to raise this money, you have got to take it from somewhere and why not take a small amount from those who are able to purchase automobiles costing over $1,000. A man that is going to buy an automobile does not hesitate in his purchase over a small tax that would be added, and it is certainly for a worthy purpose.

"Fifth. Increase the tax on admissions from 1 cent to 2 cents for each 10 cents of admission for 25 cents or under, and from 1 cent to 3 cents on admission from over 25 cents for the two years 1920 and 1921. This tax will produce about $200,000,000."

Mr. Speaker, a gentleman from New York sitting by me a few moments ago said to me that it would be the most reckless thing in the world to issue bonds of any kind. I asked him then why did New York last Friday pass an act providing $45,000,000 issue of bonds for a soldiers' bonus? He said he had forgotten about it. Now, I have offered you a plan of raising $2,000,000,000, taken with the tobacco and land tax already tentatively agreed upon in committee, that can be raised to finance this bill without going into the sales-tax problem that has as many problems and plagues in store for the American people, if once adopted, as Pandora's box.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; certainly.

Mr. GARNER. I want to ask the gentleman this question: I agree with some of the suggestions that he makes with reference to the method of raising this revenue in preference to the sales tax. Let us suppose that the gentleman can not get an opportunity to offer his proposition instead of the sales tax, what is the gentleman going to do?

Mr. FREAR. I do not know. If the gentleman brings me up against that proposition, I do not know what I can do unless it is to go and confer with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], who has had experience in these matters.

Mr. GARNER. I will say to the gentleman that if he can get enough of his side to confer with the gentleman from Texas and follow him, we will put a different tax on than a sales tax.

Mr. FREAR. Let me say this to the gentleman: I have always stood with my own side in political matters that are of a strictly party character, because without party organization it is practically impossible to secure much needed legislation, and parties are a necessary part of our governmental system; but it seems to me this ought not to be of a partisan nature. I feel that Members on both sides of the aisle ought to reach a proper solution. I am in hopes that at this time our party is going to try to take up some of these other matters, and I sincerely hope that we will get away from this consumption tax, this sales tax, because, apart from its unjust character, I believe it is going to be a very serious thing for some people this fall; and I say that without partisanship, no matter whether my Republican friends stand with me or not. I am willing to vote for any proposition that will take care of the soldiers at this time, because I believe they are entitled to it. May I have a few minutes more, Mr. Speaker?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the gentleman's time is extended.

There was no objection.

Mr. FREAR. Mr. Speaker, in my State of Wisconsin last summer we passed a bill that gave $20,000,000 to our soldiers. The bill had educational provisions in it, and other options. The money is to be raised mostly by direct taxation. I have a full belief that this Government ought to be as generous proportionately as our State. Our whole Wisconsin delegation in the House have instructed me, and they stand behind it, to say that they are opposed to a consumption tax in this bill, because our people are opposed to it. I am in hopes that the Members on this side of the aisle, the members of the Committee on Ways and Means, will get together with members of the Committee on Ways and Means on the Democratic side of the aisle and pass a bill that will put through a soldiers' compensation act which will be generous to the soldiers and at the same time will not place a direct burden on every individual who buys a pound of sugar or a suit of clothes or a pair of shoes.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GRIFFIN. How much will the bonus passed by the gentleman's legislature yield to each soldier?

Mr. FREAR. The cash bonus so-called yields only $10 a month.

Mr. GRIFFIN. That is for the length of the service?

Mr. FREAR. Yes; but there are some educational provisions in the bill passed by Wisconsin which cover far more generous treatment, and for a State we have shown grateful appreciation of our boys who were in the war.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Then, if we pass this bonus bill here the soldiers of Wisconsin will get a double bonus?

Mr. FREAR. They will get whatever we give them here just like New York soldiers who are to be cared for under your law passed last week.

GOVERNMENT LOANS AND STATE LOANS.

Mr. Speaker, the New York Legislature voted a bond issue last week of $45,000,000 for a soldiers' compensation act, and yet New York financiers have kept the Washington wires busy with dire predictions of what will happen to business if the American Congress permits any part of the proposed Government compensation plan to be paid by a public loan.

Ex-Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo recently declared that a billion-and-a-half-dollar loan could be floated without disarranging finances, but powerful interests insist that any fund to meet the soldiers' relief act must be raised by a consumption tax, so that every citizen may know what taxes mean and incidentally those who since the beginning of the European war have been grabbing on to all the loose wealth of the world will be relieved.

On September 2, 1919, by a State-wide vote of 165,762 to 57,324, or three to one, Wisconsin took the initiative in soldiers' aid and adopted a twenty-million-dollar compensation act for her soldiers, previously passed by the legislature, which gave options of cash, vocational training, and other aid. The people of my State did not forget that immediately after the declaration of war we furnished, together with Michigan, the Thirty-second Division of National Guard soldiers, whose deaths in battle reached 2,915, or more than the Forty-second, Rainbow Division, to which Wisconsin also contributed. These two divisions stood next to the Regulars and marines in heavy death losses and also in casualties, which in each division exceeded 13,000. Their record during the hard fighting on the Marne will never be forgotten.

No distinction exists among American soldiers for heroism, because all State organizations were absorbed in the one great Army that shed luster on America's fame, but if the Congress that sent our boys to war does not give recognition of their sacrifices, whether through bonds or income taxes or other means, then it is time we have a new birth of patriotism from among the Members, uninfluenced by interests on the outside whose sole god here below appears to be personal profit.

When Congress declared war against Germany it called on every able-bodied man in the country between certain ages to fight for the remaining hundred million people. Our young men everywhere were taken from schools and farms, from shops and offices, and thrown against the professional soldiers of Europe, and against modern machine guns, poisoned gas, and all other weapons of warfare. The rest of our people remained home amid the comforts and even the luxuries of life, enjoying comparatively peaceful surroundings. Fictitious prosperity reigned, millionaires multiplied two hundred fold, and an orgy of profiteering ensued among certain interests in this country that will ever remain a blot on the pages of that war.

WHAT COMPENSATION THIS BILL AFFORDS.

Our boys came back victorious. They did the job this American Congress sent them to do and did it well. They did it at a dollar a day or slightly more in the case of enlisted men. They did it uncomplainingly; they broke up countless homes when they left, some of them for all time to come; they sacrificed comforts that we continued to enjoy, and they did all this for their country and for us. Nothing we can do here will pay for that service and sacrifice. We can only imperfectly express our appreciation, and that we offer in this bill which gives to the soldiers and to army nurses who served over 60 days a dollar and a quarter a day for army service with an option to pursue a vocational education, or to receive life insurance based on the days of army service, or a preferential right to Government farms when reclaimed with an extra allowance on the three options reaching $1.75 per day for every day over the 60 days for which an allowance has heretofore been made by law. I wish the bill covered all soldiers and sailors of the war and gave better opportunities for home making.

Our country's financial situation, national indebtedness, and heavy living expenses that affect every household have been urged upon the committee as reasons why any relief measure should be extremely limited in its scope and even why no soldiers' compensation bill should pass. Many great financial interests that profited most by the war have opposed any relief bill. Organizations that preach patriotism from the housetops, like the so-called Security League of New York that selfishly capitalized loyalty during the war and since; that now demand Congress shall inaugurate an expensive, burdensome, compulsory military service which proved the downfall of Prussia; that have no sympathy or sentiment for what they term the "subcaliber" man—these are against the soldiers' compensation bill. Thank God we have proportionately few supermen of the Menken, Orth, "Security League" type.

Mr. Speaker, profiteering corporations and men of vast wealth have sent their protests to the committee objecting to any soldiers' compensation bill.

A WEST POINTER WHO OBJECTS TO ANY COMPENSATION BILL.

Keech, a New York banker, a witness from 7 Wall Street, testified before our committee that he paid an income tax indicating profits of several hundred thousand dollars annually, which placed him in the multimillionaire class. Keech vigorously opposed the passage of any bill to help those who did the real fighting while he was profiting at home, and he said to our committee that the army experience was sufficient compensation for every soldier, yet Keech, a West Point graduate, strangely missed that compensation by staying at home. There are many Keeches in the land who did not have to wear the soldiers' overcoats throughout last winter because of the high cost of living.

In order to pay the allowance provided for in the bill, it is now proposed, as I have said, to have a tax on sales of 1 per cent, and it has been urged on the committee that the tax is so slight it will not be felt, but why levy a general sales tax? Why not take further profits from those who profiteered during the war and from those who are profiteering to-day? I am opposed to any sales tax and hope the American Congress will never put any such burden on the people to meet the needs of this bill. The committee bill should be modified by laying taxes on those best able to pay.

If the war has brought one lesson, it is that in order to preserve our Government the constant shifting of public burdens to the shoulders of those already heavy laden will be challenged by the many who make possible the excessive profits of the few. This bill should compel those best able to pay to contribute now in proportion to their means, and any failure to provide such method of taxing will be economically and radically wrong and will return to plague those who try to shift the burden to those who now pay the profits.

LEGITIMATE REVENUE MEANS V. AN INIQUITOUS SALES TAX.

I have offered a substitute proposition that will raise every dollar needed. It has been rejected by the committee, but I trust the House will accept it in whole or in part. I have presented it to you in argument, but briefly summarized it is as follows:

First. Increase the normal personal income tax for the years 1919, 1920, and 1921 to rates imposed and collected for the year 1918—that is, increase the present rates of 4 to 8 per cent to 6 to 12 per cent. This will produce approximately $170,000,000 a year, or $500,000,000 for the three years. It will produce nearly five times as much as the proposed committee increase.

Second. Extend the normal tax to dividends received by individuals from corporations for the years 1920 and 1921. This will produce about $240,000,000 a year and $480,000,000 for the two years.

Third. Tax stock dividends for the three years 1919, 1920, and 1921 at 25 per cent—approximately the rate that would be imposed had not the Supreme Court ruled that the tax on such dividends in the 1918 revenue act were unconstitutional. This tax would produce approximately $150,000,000, principally from the dividends declared during the year 1920.

This will reinstate the tax that was set aside by a vote of 5 to 4 in the Supreme Court, and this Congress will be justly condemned if it fails to do so.

Fourth. Double the tax on automobiles of over $1,000, trucks, parts, and accessories. This will produce for two years—1920 and 1921—$200,000,000. The present rate of taxes is 3 per cent on trucks and 5 per cent on automobiles and accessories, including tires.

This increase in whole or in part will help to curb extravagance, conserve the vanishing gasoline supply, and bring needed aid to the Treasury.

Fifth. Increase the tax on admissions from 1 cent to 2 cents for each 10 cents on admissions for 25 cents or under, and from 1 cent to 3 cents on admissions of over 25 cents for the two years 1920 and 1921. This tax will produce about $200,000,000.

New York producers propose to charge $5 for theater tickets. In this age of profiteering and reckless extravagance the tax will be of value in helping a soldiers' compensation bill.

Sixth. A tax of 1 per cent on sales of real estate. This tax will produce about $100,000,000 annually, or $200,000,000 for the years 1920 and 1921.

This tax has been adopted by the committee, but only at half rates.

The total of the above additional taxes for two years would be $1,730,000,000, according to estimates furnished me by Treasury experts.

The foregoing taxing methods will raise more than is required by the bill. If further income is needed, however, the tobacco-increase tax of $150,000,000, brokerage-sales tax reaching $200,000,000, and many other plans, or a short-time loan for part of the fund can be adopted in preference to a consumption tax, which is a vicious and unnecessary tax. The foregoing methods would raise $2,000,000,000, or a larger amount than can possibly be needed.

Why should not an increased income tax equal to the 1918 tax be adopted? Why not reenact the law of 1918 as above suggested? Why not approach a more just and equitable tax as evidenced by the tax law now in force in Great Britain?

I speak especially of this proper increase in income tax, because it will raise over twice as much as the feeble committee effort and is justified in every way.

In reply to many random statements, I present here a comparison of English and American tax rates on the different personal incomes to show how far below the English rates our taxes now are to those possessing a million dollars or less of this world's goods:

OUR INCOME-TAX RATE FAR BELOW GREAT BRITAIN.

[1] These income-tax rates now pass each other at $250,000 annual income. Under the plan I propose to reinstate, the 1918 rates, 4 per cent will be added to above rates, so that our rate would pass that of Great Britain at $200,000, but will average far below the English rates on incomes under that amount.

The foregoing statement of comparative income tax rates in the United States and Great Britain, prepared by Treasury officials, discloses the following:

At $3,000 the rate in Great Britain now is ten times that of the United States.

At $5,000 the rate in Great Britain now is over six times that of the United States.

At $20,000 the rate in Great Britain now is over three and one-half times that of the United States.

At $50,000 the rate in Great Britain now is about two and one-fourth times that of the United States.

At $100,000 the rate in Great Britain now is about one and one-half times that of the United States.

At $200,000 the rate in Great Britain now is 5 per cent greater than our tax.

At $250,000 the rate in Great Britain now is about the same as ours.

At $1,000,000 annual income our tax is 16 per cent greater than that of Great Britain.

In other words, either Great Britain is grossly overtaxing incomes from $3,000 to $50,000 or else we are undertaxing them. In estimating wealth based on income it is customary to use $50,000 annual income as a conservative average for entrance into the millionaire class. Of that income, under our laws, less than 20 per cent is deducted, whereas Great Britain takes over 40 per cent of the income, or more than double our rate.

On incomes of $100,000 annually, indicating $2,000,000 in wealth, 31 per cent is deducted under our law and 47.19 per cent, or nearly one-half more, is taken under the English law.

On incomes over $250,000 annually, indicating approximately $5,000,000 in wealth, our taxes begin to run higher than Great Britain's until they finally reach two-thirds of $1,000,000 annual income, which indicates $20,000,000 in wealth. Those who have such enormous wealth do not require great incomes to keep the wolf from the door. In other words, outside of a handful of enormously wealthy men, our income taxes are far below those of Great Britain, and our millionaires, who increased 200 per cent during the war, and now reach anywhere from 10,000 to 20,000, depending on the basis of estimates, have not been compelled to wear overalls or cut out their meat diet due to the high cost of living. Why should they not pay higher taxes?

ANOTHER TAX BOOST THIS MONTH FOR GREAT BRITAIN.

Mr. Speaker, the following cablegram to the Washington Post of April 20, to which I have briefly referred, is illuminating when comparing English finances with our own:

DRASTIC TAXATION OF BRITISH PROFITS—WILL RAISE LEVY TO 60 PER CENT, SAYS CHANCELLOR, INTRODUCING NEW BUDGET—POSTAL RATES GOING UP.

LONDON, April 19.

The feature of the budget statement delivered in the House of Commons to-day by J. Austen Chamberlain, chancellor of the exchequer, was the revelation of the country's bounding revenue and a surprise by the chancellor in his announcement of a purpose to raise the excess-profits tax to 60 per cent when it had been expected this tax would be abolished and a substitute tax proposed.

In closing his speech Mr. Chamberlain, referring to the gigantic sacrifices that had been endured throughout the war, described the nation's position as "one of unexampled and unequaled strength." He made no proposal, such as had been forecast, to institute a sinking fund to redeem the national debt within 50 years, but he announced that there would be no more borrowing to balance revenue and expenditures, and estimated that the new tax proposals would enable the redemption of £234,000,000 of the debt this year and £300,000,000 next year.

The new taxation proposal included increases in postal and telegraph rates, a 50 per cent ad valorem tax on imported cigars, a number of additional stamp duties on commercial and stock-exchange transactions, and a new tax of a shilling in the pound on limited-liability profits. The income tax was not changed, except for an additional supertax of 6 pence in the pound on incomes exceeding £30,000 per year.

Two questions were left over for special bills, namely, taxation or levy on war wealth and changes incident to the income tax in accordance with the recommendations of the royal commission, under which the exemption list for married couples will be £250 and for unmarried persons £150.

BUDGET DEBATE POSTPONED.

The present taxes on motor cars and petrol are to continue in force until the end of the year, when they will be superseded by new taxes.

Dealing with excess profits, the chancellor said the yield had greatly exceeded any forecast he should have dared to make, and had he foreseen the present situation no such reduction by 40 per cent would have been made last year.

The foregoing indicates Great Britain proposes to raise the existing rates, which I have used for purposes of comparison.

While the British taxation laws are different from our own in several respects, I am informed by a high Treasury authority that, considering local methods of taxation, which in Great Britain covers a multitude of specifically taxed articles, and also taxes for different municipalities, the foregoing tables give a fair comparison of rates of taxation in the two countries.

COMPARATIVE ABILITY TO PAY.

Estimates of comparative national wealth and of national indebtedness are also of interest. The only basis of comparison exists for the year 1917.

	United States.	Great Britain.	France.
Wealth	$220,000,000,000	$80,000,000,000	$60,000,000,000
Indebtedness	26,000,000,000	37,000,000,000	34,000,000,000

From the foregoing it appears that the indebtedness of the United States, after deducting the probable repayment of allied loans, is less than 10 per cent of our wealth. The debt of the United Kingdom, reaching $37,000,000,000, can not be accurately charged against Great Britain alone, but conservatively estimated it will reach over one-third of Great Britain's wealth, while France struggles under a debt burden of approximately 50 per cent of its wealth.

Considering that of the three countries compared England and France have lost in national wealth since 1917 and that our crop of war profiteers have enormously increased their individual wealth at the expense of our own and other countries, it is fair and just to require those who have to pay liberally toward a cause that grants some small relief to the soldiers, who made profiteering possible.

OTHER PLANS HAVE PROVOKED SERIOUS CRITICISM.

Mr. Speaker, I have not carefully examined the present plan for raising funds advocated by Representative RAINEY. His original plan would have resulted in bankruptcy to many solvent individuals, according to Government financial experts with whom I consulted, because in making the tax retroactive from 1915 it lays a burden on men that is five times the ordinary war-tax burden. Few companies could withstand this assault on their credit and the probability is it would result in the defeat of the soldiers' bill in the Senate, rather than to invite financial catastrophe. His present bill I can not pass upon, but I do say that the plan I propose makes a retroactive tax only in the one year of 1919 and then only to the same extent that the tax was paid in 1918. This income tax, which is the war income tax reenacted, for three years will produce $500,000,000 without injuring any legitimate business, according to the best Government Treasury experts, and will provide one-third of the entire fund to be raised.

The remaining tax distributed over stock dividends and other plans I have suggested will raise more than enough to finance the bill according to the same high authority. I agree that those best able to pay should bear the largest part of the burden and that they are amply able to do so is evidenced by the official reports of their enormous profits since the European war began.

EXCESS PROFITS THAT SHOULD HELP FINANCE THE GOVERNMENT.

I quote briefly a table of corporation profits which I placed in the RECORD in April, 1918. They indicate the enormous profiteering that has continued down to this date.

Many thousands of corporations necessarily are omitted from the list. The profits of many individuals and corporations have increased over anything appearing in the above lists.

I believe that a full understanding of the stock-dividend tax and increased income tax, whereby $650,000,000 can be raised, will appeal to every advocate of a just taxing system, and so I present other interesting data on the subject.

On March 8, 1920, the Supreme Court, in a suit then pending, by a 5 to 4 hair-trigger vote, decided that undistributed profits turned into a business in the form of stock dividends are not subject to income taxes, which decision places a premium on large capitalization on which abnormal profits may hereafter be demanded and collected. Standard Oil, in sympathy with other securities on the market affected by the decision, jumped 50 points the next day. Under my proposal these dividends will bring in $150,000,000 with which to meet the needs of this bill granting compensation to soldiers.

SOME MORE PROFITEERING.

On February 28, 1920, Mr. TILSON, of our committee, specifically charged that the cotton mills of the country averaged profits during the 1914–1919 period of 125 to 600 per cent, and urged an investigation in order to determine who was responsible for profiteering and what relief could be accorded. In his statement of increased prices appears three grades of cotton yarns, quoted as follows:

	1914		1918		1919
	June.	December.	June.	December.	June.	December.
2–40 s	$0.43	$0.38	$1.00	$0.95	$1.20	$2.50
2–60 s	.55	.50	1.25	1.20	1.55	3.50
2–80 s	.75	.70	1.55	1.50	2.00	4.75

An increase of from $1.50 in December, 1918, to $4.75 in December, 1919, discloses a fever of present-day profiteering. Many cotton mills declared quarterly dividends of 10 per cent.

The National Garment Retailers' Association is quoted as authority for a statement that many woolen mills recently declared a quarterly dividend of 10 per cent.

According to the Public Ledger, a Providence, R. I., shoe firm has profiteered to the extent of 800 per cent on its products. According to Judge Brandeis's decision on March 8, 1920, Standard Oil's annual dividends in 1914, 1915, and 1916 reached from 60 per cent to 80 per cent annually.

On April 20, 1920, Sears, Roebuck declared a 40 per cent dividend on its $75,000,000 of stock, and the most startling evidence of the riotous spirit of profiteering is contained in a press statement that this stock, which sold for $20 a share in 1907, now has a market value of $690, exclusive of dividends that have been regularly paid by this concern.

Practically every product entering into commercial industry for which the consumer eventually pays has increased in price during the past five years to percentages reaching hundreds, and in some cases a thousand per cent and over.

OUR GENEROUS CROP OF MILLIONAIRES SHOULD GENEROUSLY PAY PROPORTIONATELY.

According to the collector of internal revenue this epidemic of profiteering and legalized robbery of the helpless public has resulted in the following increase in annual incomes:

	1914	1917
Incomes over $25,000		49,794
Incomes over $50,000	7,509	19,103
Incomes over $100,000	2,348	6,664

Based on 10 per cent of $1,000,000, the millionaires in number jumped from 2,348 in 1914 to 6,664 in 1917.

Based on 5 per cent of $1,000,000, used by other authorities, the millionaires jumped from 7,509 in 1914 to 19,103 in 1917, while 50,000 people, in round numbers, now possess a half million dollars or over in this country, according to the same basis of estimates.

An astounding recital of enormous profits squeezed from the helpless public was exposed last week by a distinguished Senator. I briefly quote a few of his illustrations of profiteering gone mad, which exists throughout our land, where might makes right, while the needy culprit who steals a loaf of bread or pair of shoes finds quick lodging behind the bars. The statement made in another body last Saturday shows the following stock dividends to have been recently declared, dividends on which I propose to raise $150,000,000 with which to help finance the soldiers' compensation bill:

RECENT STOCK DIVIDENDS—NAMES AND EARNINGS PRESENTED.

Continental Oil, 200 per cent; United Fuel Gas, 200 per cent; Ohio Fuel Supply, 100 per cent; Nonquit Spinning Co., 100 per cent; Amoskeag Cotton Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; Stutz Motors, 100 per cent; Nashua Manufacturing Co., 100 per cent; American Tobacco Securities Co., 75 per cent; Manomet Mills, 66⅔ per cent; Hood Rubber, 66⅔ per cent; Crucible Steel, 50 per cent; Cleveland-Akron Bag, 50 per cent; Union Bag & Paper, 50 per cent; Auto Car Co., 40 per cent; John R. Thompson Co., 33⅓ per cent; St. Maurice Paper Co., 30 per cent; F. W. Woolworth, 30 per cent; Electric Welding of Boston, 25 per cent; Delaware & Cleveland, 25 per cent; Hawaiian Pineapple Co., 25 per cent; Electric Welding Co., 25 per cent; General Chemical, 20 per cent; American Multigraph, 20 per cent; Truscon Steel, 20 per cent.

"The Standard Oil Co. of Indiana," the Senator continued, "has recently increased its capital from $1,000,000 to $30,000,000, giving its stockholders a stock dividend of 2,900 per cent.

CANDY AND CRUDE OIL PROFITS.

"The National Candy Co.'s earnings last year showed an increase of 545 per cent over 1915; Burns Bros., the largest retail coal dealers in the United States, made a net profit of 40 cents a ton, against 23½ cents in 1916; the earnings of the United Drug Co., doing a business of $50,000,000 annually, were 242 per cent greater than 1916; the American Ice Co., which cuts ice by the millions, but not profits, has in the last four years increased its earnings 283 per cent; the International Cotton Co., doing nearly $8,000,000 worth of business last year, made 39 per cent more money, although it sold 20 per cent fewer goods; the Pacific mills output of cotton and worsted dress goods produced 34 per cent more profit than in the year before the war; and the excess-profits surplus of United States Steel—the surplus remaining after dividends—has aggregated nearly $500,000,000 in the last five years, although $315,000,000 was spent on improvements."

"These patriotic melon raisers, who have made their millions and billions during and since the war, now are urging that the soldier bonus be raised by a 1 per cent tax on sales to be paid on every dollar spent by every man, woman, and child in the country, including the ex-service men themselves.

"During the coal strike, while zero cold and privation threatened the people, the price of crude oil shot up nearly 300 per cent, and still is rising.

"It is said the poor man's luxury is tobacco. The contribution to good government of the Tobacco Products Corporation is a dividend balance showing a rise of 1,547 per cent over its 1914 profits, which the smoker had to pay or go without this solace.

"The General Cigar Co., which in 1906 acquired the property and business of the old United Cigar Co., amassed a net income of nearly 34 cents on each dollar of its sales in 1917, and in 1919 this had grown to almost 38 cents.

NAMES GAIN IN PROFITS.

"Other upholders of government and befrienders of the poor are the American Hide & Leather Co., whose profits for 1919 were more than three and one-half times larger than those it gained in 1914; the Central Leather Co., whose 1919 profits more than double those of the same months in 1918; and the Endicott-Johnson Shoe Manufacturing Corporation, whose profits rose from $2,174,430, in 1915, to $9,791,580, in 1919.

"In terms of dividends on its common stock, last year's profits of the American Hide & Leather Co. increased from 44 cents a share, in 1915, to $15.52 a share, in 1919, or thirty-five times the earnings it distributed in 1915."

It is significant that these facts presented in the Senate were offered under an amendment to the rivers and harbors bill, proposing to raise the $12,000,000 appropriation by the House to $27,000,000 in another legislative body, thereby presenting an old-fashioned, well-rounded pork barrel.

Between an extravagant pork-barrel burden and a consumption tax, in these days of heavy tax burdens, the public is between the devil and the deep sea. In the words of the litany, "Good Lord, deliver us."

MORE PROFITS THAT WANT THE EXCESS-PROFITS TAX REPEALED.

An illustration of where we are tending and the reign of profiteering that seems to have control of every avenue of industry and to which the humble consumer contributes is afforded by the following telegram taken from to-day's paper:

FIFTEEN MILLION FIVE HUNDRED AND THIRTEEN THOUSAND FOUR HUNDRED AND FIFTEEN DOLLARS NET PROFITS FOR AMERICAN WOOLEN—REPORT FOR 1919 SHOWS SURPLUS OF $12,029,804 AND TOTAL WITH THAT OF 1918 OF $31,754,426.

NEW YORK, April 27.

Net profits of the American Woolen Co. for 1919 amounted to $15,513,415, less reserves for taxes and contingencies, according to the annual report issued to-day.

Payment of dividends of $2,800,000 of preferred stock and $3,200,000 of common and depreciation of $3,733,611 left a balance of profit for the year of $5,779,850.

Surplus for 1919 amounted to $12,029,804, which, added to that of 1918, brings the total surplus to $31,754,426.

These earnings by the company show that for the year ending December 31, 1919, the surplus, after all charges and the Federal tax of $10,779,804 has been paid, was equal to a dividend of $38.89 a share on the $20,000,000 of outstanding common stock against the earnings of $5,572,527, or $13.86 on the common stock in 1918.

Reviewing the activities of the company for 1919, President William M. Wood said, in part:

"One of the features of the year has been the great demand for fine wool and cloth made of fine stock. This unprecedented demand for fine wools has resulted in tremendous increase in prices of fine stock. Since February, 1919, prices of these wools have risen 30 per cent to 40 per cent, and at the close of the year were still advancing."

THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OPPOSES A SOLDIERS' COMPENSATION BILL.

Mr. Speaker, confirmation of the organized effort to repeal the excess-profits tax and to vigorously oppose soldiers' compensation bill comes from the United States Chamber of Commerce, which is holding its annual convention at Atlantic City this very day, April 27. The press dispatches I have received say that this chamber of commerce has resolved that Congress must revise the excess-profits tax law, but need not necessarily increase the $10,000,000,000 already made to European Governments. Further, it states that we are expected "not to consume so much at home if we expect to grant further credits abroad," and further, that there must be a revision of our system of income taxation.

This organization further resolved that Congress must not pass a soldiers' bonus bill, because it will invite an "orgy" of spending, but they considerately tell us, "The United States should participate largely in foreign finances."

These orders come to the American Congress from the world's greatest summer resort, from gentlemen, some of whom, presumably, have been engaged during the years of the war in an "orgy" of profiteering, who propose to finance Europe with their surplus capital, not one out of a hundred of whom, presumably, carried a musket during the war or received only a dollar a day, from which they were obliged to make allotments to their dependents. These distinguished gentlemen, basking in the delightful surroundings at Atlantic City, have issued their orders that the boys we drafted into the service shall receive no further compensation, and ought to be satisfied with the knowledge that they as patriots in France enabled thousands of profiteers to speculate in perfect security at home during the war.

Having duly received its instructions, the American Congress is expected to act in conformity with such orders, and there will, presumably, come to us from now on an organized propaganda of hundreds of telegrams and stereotyped resolutions sent from various boards of trade throughout the country, which will spontaneously give their instructions to us on how to proceed in the matters determined upon by this overly modest chamber of commerce. In the face of the fact that Great Britain has increased its excess-profits tax 60 per cent, according to the cablegram I have presented to the House, we are advised by this distinguished body at Atlantic City in the following telegram, which has just been received:

ATLANTIC CITY, N. J., April 27.

The United States Chamber of Commerce would go on record as opposed to the granting of a bonus to soldiers who served in the World War by adoption of a resolution submitted for action by the resolutions committee at the initial session of its eighth annual convention here to-day.

VIEW OF EXCESS-PROFITS TAX.

Revision of the excess-profits and income taxes "so that large investors can afford to put their funds in other than tax-free securities," is urged in the report, the point being made that only by the freeing of large capital can any appreciable progress toward meeting Europe's needs be made.

Discussing the need for a fixed governmental policy of sanction and cooperation, the report said there was no thought of suggesting that the Government alter its policy of not increasing the $10,000,000,000 it already has advanced to European countries.

FURTHER CREDIT TO FOREIGN NATIONS.

"A most immediate and important problem for this country," the report continues, "is how to extend further credit to foreign nations without bringing about added inflation at home. It is generally conceded that further inflation of our credit structure must be checked if commodity prices are to decline or even to remain stationary. Advancing commodity prices would more than offset any gain to European purchasers through better exchange rates.

"In the United States it is quite clear that at least two things must happen to improve our domestic situation before we can safely grant further large credits abroad: (a) The first is diminished home consumption and the saving resulting therefrom, and, if possible, increased production; (b) second, there must be a revision of our system of income taxation.

FOREIGN TRADE DISCUSSED.

"The matter of foreign investment has been referred to as not a matter of sentiment, but of arithmetic. It is inevitable that the United States, as a great unit in the world's economic affairs, should participate largely in foreign trade and in foreign financing.

"But, from the standpoint of Europe, the worst possible result at this time would be to hold out hopes of assistance which can not be realized. From the standpoint of America, the worst result conceivable at this time would be to attempt to set in operation machinery for the extension of foreign credits which would not, in fact, operate."

THE INIQUITY OF A GENERAL CONSUMPTION TAX.

Mr. Speaker, a general sales tax proposed by the committee bill will serve to increase the profits of the small army of profiteers, because for every cent of tax levied by law, five to ten times the actual tax will be collected from the paying public while the profiteer keeps the surplus.

In other words, if we had adopted the plan first given out to the press from the subcommittee, of financing the billion and a half of dollars needed by this bill, through a general consumption tax, a burden of several billion dollars would have been placed uniformly on the financier and farmer alike, irrespective of their comparative ability to pay.

I am not permitted to suggest what may have influenced a reduction that now limits the proposed consumption tax to $800,000,000, but bearing in mind this tax will mean a direct burden of from two to four billion dollars on the ex-soldier, the merchant and mechanic, the salaried clerk and shopworker, the iniquity of the whole scheme serves as a reminder of the utter selfishness of big business and of conscienceless profiteering influences that demand this tax.

Any party that puts this scheme of financing into law, that closes its eyes to the enormous profits taken to-day from the helpless public, will compel its candidates from Maine to California to explain why a bill was passed by this Congress which taxes the consumer in order to protect profiteers. I am firm in my belief that the vast majority of Republicans of the country will resent such action if taken by Congress, and the same is probably true of those of the opposite political faith.

A large majority of the House Republicans and Democrats are for a soldiers' compensation bill, and the only reason why a sales tax will be accepted, if at all, is in order to pass the bill, but every Representative who is to become a candidate for reelection must be prepared to face the fact that the purpose of passing this consumption tax is not alone to place the burden on those who are least able to pay. A tax on everything we eat, drink, and wear is vicious in itself, but it may be intended to prepare us for a next move by the great financial interests of the country.

A vigorous propaganda is being pushed on the Ways and Means Committee by commercial bodies throughout the land fostered by large business interests and those affected by the present excess-profits tax on corporate earnings which now reaches the enormous profits of corporations. This pressure is to have that tax law repealed on the theory that in some unexplainable manner such action will moderate the cupidity of the profiteer and through some psychological surgical operation reach his conscience, so as to cause a voluntary reduction in prices and lower the high cost of living. By repealing the excess-profits tax and shifting tax burdens from the shoulders of those who reap the profits to the backs of those who pay the price we are told we will reduce the cost to the man that eventually pays all profits. This consumption tax is an entering wedge toward a repeal of the excess-profits tax. It is brought out under the cloak of helping the soldiers' bill in a belief that the public will not resent it for that reason. While Great Britain is increasing their tax we are asked to repeal ours.

I do not know what the parliamentary situation will be when this bill comes up for passage. I will support the bill because I have been with Chairman FORDNEY for its passage from the beginning; but if opportunity is afforded I shall vote against the iniquitous sales tax, and I hope if it passes the House that the Senate will not jeopardize the election of many able Members of this body in close districts by permitting the sales tax to remain in the bill.

THE COMMITTEE HAS WORKED HARD AND FAITHFULLY—DO NOT MAKE A MISTAKE NOW.

I have no criticism to make against my colleagues on the committee, however widely I differ from them on this tax. The members of the Ways and Means Committee have worked hard and honestly to give a good bill to the soldiers, and no committee could work harder or more conscientiously to that end; but if we retain the sales tax we will make a political and economic blunder that will rise to plague us long after the coming campaign has recorded its list of political deaths and burials.

I have offered a plan that will raise far more money than the bill will require. It places income tax where it was in 1918, and then it is less than one-half the tax of Great Britain at $20,000 and slightly over one-half at $50,000, which will reach the millionaire class. It immediately compels stock dividends to pay their fair share of revenue, and I am informed by Treasury experts that it is not only easily workable in all its parts but it is eminently fair and proper. I hope the House will accept this substitute.

OUR SOLDIERS DESERVE ALL THAT WE CAN GIVE.

Mr. Speaker, I shall not discuss the several options offered under the bill beyond a mere statement of their effect. An enormous national debt of $25,000,000,000 prevents us from more adequately measuring the claims for compensation that never can be fairly adjusted by our country. Patriotism is not merely a matter of lip service, and when we told our soldier boys "God-speed; we are with you; the country needs you and we will never forget," we meant it or else we were arrant hypocrites; and this bill to the extent of one billion and a half dollars says we have not forgotten them. We promised to bring home to America all those who fell in France and whose relatives asked for the return of their bodies; we promised to provide for those who returned maimed or broken in body and health; we promised to remember the sacrifices of all who were called to the colors, whether they fought in France or not. As we keep such promises we will grow in strength as a Nation worthy of the sacrifice made in all wars, whether past or yet to come.

Patriotism is inborn, and no compensation can reward patriotism; but let us not delude ourselves into believing we can share the mantle of patriotism by lip service alone. This bill, imperfect though it is, should be passed unanimously, as we passed every war measure, without a suspicion of partisanship or sectionalism.

Let us say to those who carried our flag to victory on the fields of France, even as the men of America have met every test in other wars, that we are a grateful people, that we cherish those who did our fighting, and that we are proud of the citizen soldier, for in him will ever be found the safeguard of the Republic. We owe him a debt that can never be paid. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] is recognized for 30 minutes. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. The House gave me 30 minutes, and I would like to have 40 minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent that he may speak for 40 minutes instead of 30 minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. [Applause.]

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, my situation here late in the evening to make a speech reminds me of the tale that Amos Cummings used to tell. He said that some Member from Pennsylvania who was making a campaign speech here one night with a slight attendance was reading his speech in a low voice and some wag kept asking him to raise his voice so that they could hear, and after a while he got tired of it and he said, "I do not care whether you men hear me or not; the people down in the Cumberland Valley of Pennsylvania will hear me [applause and laughter], and I am speaking to them." Now, I am going to make a speech here for the man in the street, the man at the cross roads, the ordinary citizen who does not know a thing in the world about parliamentary procedure here. I am going to make it so plain that he can not misunderstand what this Ways and Means Committee and Rules Committee are up to. I am in favor of a bonus or compensation of the soldiers during the Great War. [Applause.] Always have been in favor of it. In my judgment, there is nothing too good for our soldiers. No greater love hath any man than he should die or offer to die for his country, as these soldiers did. I have never failed to vote for a pension bill since I have been here and I am going to keep up that policy until the end. The reason underlying my action is that we are never going to have a big standing army until the Republic is on its last legs, and therefore we have got to take good care of the men who volunteer, and in this case the men who were drafted, too. It is the only way the Republic can get soldiers. There have been all sorts of propositions brought here as to this bonus, ranging from $180 that Mr. POU advocated—and, by the way, he made one of the best speeches made in this Congress when he did it—that was the difference between this $240 bonus paid to the clerks and this $60 that we paid the soldiers when the war was over. From that proposition bonuses ranged up to $500. Then we had the Lane-Mondell bill, which seems to have gone glimmering. I have not heard anything of that for a long time, although I have tried to exact information both from the gentleman who is presiding [Mr. CAMPBELL of Kansas], chairman of the great Committee on Rules, and the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] himself. I took part in the first consultation that was held about that bill. Secretary Lane called it and, among others, invited me to be present. Finally the Members, a great many of them, got it in their heads that if that bill ever passed it would amount to nothing on earth except an irrigation scheme. That arid country out West is a good place for human habitation, but everybody does not want to go out there. There was a good deal of talk, especially over on our side, about what come to be known as the Morgan bill. The Morgan bill, as I understand it, proposes to lend $5,000, on easy terms, to a soldier to buy a home anywhere he pleases, and it appealed to me with more force than did the so-called Mondell bill. But out of all these various propositions this House ought to have sense enough to extract something that is practicable and feasible and just.

Of course, you can not pay these soldiers this compensation or bonus without getting the money somewhere, and the only way we know to get money for the Government is by way of taxes. No human being ever liked to pay taxes. I will give a hundred dollars to see the color of a man's hair and the cut of his eye that will make an affidavit that he enjoys paying taxes like he used to enjoy going to see his sweetheart. There is no such man. [Laughter.] Legislators do not like to levy new taxes. It is an unpleasant job, and Brother FREAR gave the real reason for it, or one of them, and that is that it might affect you at the coming election.

What the Democrats want, and a good many Republicans, as I understand it—and I am not going to talk any politics—is an opportunity to debate the bill in here and amend it and get it to suit.

I was talking to one of the bigwigs a night or two ago, and I told him we ought to have a chance to amend this bill. He said, "If you let them amend it, the House will go wild." Suppose it does go wild. We have a right to go wild if we want to, and we have a right to express an opinion on as important a bill as this is, that is estimated, any way you fix it, will take $1,500,000,000, and maybe more. Of course, you gentlemen are all expert parliamentarians, but the people outside do not know the modus operandi of this House. I want them to understand—and when they read this speech they will understand it—that the ordinary way of getting a bill up here and passing it is under the general rules of the House. You get it up and debate and amend it until you get through with it, and then vote on it. That is the general plan. Then there are two other ways, popular here, of getting bills up so that you can limit the proceedings in the House. One of them is for the Rules Committee to bring in a special rule providing that bills shall be read a third time and passed, and so forth, without any intervening motion except one motion to recommit. If it was not that the general rule of the House compels the motion to recommit to be entered, a whole lot of bills would be rushed through here without doing that. The second way is under the plan of suspending the rules and passing the bill. That is what you are going to try to do next Monday. And I am against it. Under the suspension of the rules—and some of you Members had better be turning this over in your head, too—you can not amend it; you can not offer a motion to recommit. It does not apply. And whatever is read from the desk here is the thing you have got to vote on. I think the man down the street can understand that.

I understand the Rules Committee here considered for a while bringing in a rule nearly as severe as suspension of the rules, but they got afraid that they could not pass the rule. I do not believe they can pass it. [Applause.] If they bring in a rule here to do that, they will have the hardest scuffle they have had for a long time to get it through. Under this suspension of the rules you have got to have two-thirds. You can not amend it; you can not discuss it beyond 40 minutes; and can not offer this motion to recommit; and you are absolutely at the mercy of the men who are running the affairs over on the Republican side of the House.

I want to refresh the memories of some of you newer Members here, and I do not want to say anything unkind, and I am not going to do so. We had a great parliamentary revolution here on the 19th day of March, 1910. We took two heats at it. We tried it on the 15th of March, 1909, and got a bloody licking, but on the 19th of March, 1910, we upset the machine here. We could not have done that without some reason for upsetting it, and sending you people wandering in the wilderness for eight years. One of the things that upset it was the continual iteration and reiteration—and to some people it appeared a damnable iteration, no doubt—that the Rules Committee abused its powers continuously and constantly by bringing in these rules here that did not permit of amendment. That was one of the main things they did. I am not going to say anything unkind about men that are on the other side over here, but that is one of the things that did it. Now, I will give you a general warning. People do not forget. Human nature has not changed one particle since Adam and Eve were driven with flaming swords from Paradise, and never will change until the great Judgment Day, when the earth perishes with fervent heat. You are entering on identically the same course of conduct that enabled me and my colleagues to upset the machine on the 19th day of March, 1910. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Three-fourths of the rules brought in here now do not permit any amendment except that one motion to recommit, and you can not do away with it because the general rules of the House forbid the Rules Committee to report a rule trying to cut out that motion to recommit. You are going back to your old bad habit of bringing in rules to cut off amendments.

I have been consistent about this thing. When I could, when I was Speaker, I prevented the Committee on Rules in the Democratic House from bringing in any such rule.

When they brought in the principal one of that sort which they ever did bring in without permitting amendment I took the floor and fought it. I went to the chairman, the man who was managing the bill, and told him that I would not stultify myself by insisting on one line of conduct while I was in the minority and following another line of conduct when I was in the majority. [Applause on the Democratic side.] That was on the proposition to repeal the Panama Canal tolls law, and in order to make the fight for the right of amendment I had to fight the administration that I had done more than any other living man to place in power. [Applause.] We got beat. I did not want to make the fight. It was exceedingly unpleasant, and I spent three or four nights turning the question over in my head whether it was possible for me to vote for that rule and at the same time keep the pledges that I had made individually and the pledges that the Democrats had made; and I concluded that it could not be done, and so I fought it, and received a good deal of abuse in consequence. But I look back on that speech as one of the best performances of my life, and on that day as one of the greatest days of my career. [Applause.]

I am warning you. The breakers are ahead of you, and you will get trounced on account of these rules that the present temporary majority of the House Rules Committee is continually bringing in here. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Napoleon said: "The Bourbons learn nothing and forget nothing." The great Emperor's saying applies to the Republican leaders in this House.

All that we want is a chance to offer amendments. I do not think that the House is in the habit of running wild. The only time I ever saw it get thoroughly wild was one evening when the Agricultural appropriation bill was up in the Senate and there were seven Senators over there, with one in the chair and three of them asleep, and Senator McCUMBER got his land-bank bill hitched onto the Agricultural bill as an amendment, and they sent it over here, consisting of 26 pages, which nobody had ever read. Many times I have seen a dozen men on the floor here trying to get recognition at once, but this time it looked as if half the membership got up; it was like Roderick Dhu's men rising out of the heather. I picked out one man from the multitude who moved to send it to committee; I recognized him, and that was done. I was in favor of the land bank, but not in favor of legislating in that way.

If this question has not been made plain enough in these remarks, I will see to it that they are made plain enough to-night when I come to revise my speech. [Laughter.] I want people to know how you Republican leaders are trying to play politics with this bill. I am dead against this proposition in this bill that they are cooking up—to put on a sales tax.

Let me say that Congress never ought to pass a bill that has in it more irritation than revenue, or one that will produce more irritation than revenue. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] The irritation will surely come. I had an experience about this thing not long ago. I wanted a dress shirt, so I went down to Parker & Bridget's and got me a dress shirt for $2.50, and there was not any of this luxury tax on that. I gave the clerk who sold it to me a $10 bill and told him to get the change out. While he was getting the change I looked into a showcase and I found there a fine shirt with small red stripes, and I like to wear that kind. During the war you could not get a shirt with red stripes in it that would not fade out. I said to the clerk, "What is the price of that shirt?" He said, "Three dollars." I said, "Give me one and take it out of that $10." When he came back with the change the boy did not have change enough. I said, "You are gouging me out of 30 cents. What is that for?" He said, "That is because of the sales tax that you damned fools enacted up there in Congress." [Laughter.] Now, that is the tax that every man kicks about when he pays it.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman will remember that the Democratic Congress passed a bill imposing during the war a luxury tax, and the Republican Committee on Ways and Means reported a bill repealing that.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Yes. That showed a lack of sense. Nobody of any sense has any prejudice against a man because he has money or because he is a millionaire. Every sensible man in this House, I think, will agree to that. But while the soldiers were over there on the other side dying in the trenches or on the battle field these people were here making money out of the dead. They have got it, and it is estimated that you can get this billion and a half of dollars out of them pretty easily, and I am in favor of getting it out of them. [Applause.]

Perhaps some fool will rise up somewhere in some place and say, "You are advocating this bonus bill because your son was over there." Of course, my son was over there. He was the youngest colonel over there in the American Army, but he does not get any of this bonus, because he had the rank of colonel. So I feel absolutely free to talk about it. [Applause.] It is a poor privilege that we ask, to amend this bill, and you know about what amendments we are going to offer, something like the bill that the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, has offered, or that proposed by the gentleman from South Dakota, Mr. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, to take this billion and a half or two billion dollars, or whatever it is, out of those who are ablest to pay it. That is the whole bill in a nutshell, and it is of no use to waste more words on it. I yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY]. [Applause.]

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has 20 minutes.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I may not occupy even 20 minutes, and I would not take the time of the House at this hour to make any replies to the personal assaults which have been made upon me by my Republican colleagues on the Ways and Means Committee, if it were not for the fact that the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] are now in their seats and can hear what I say.

In the early portion of my career I practiced law, but for many years farming has been my only occupation. When I was a very young lawyer I practiced in the less important courts. I soon was able to abandon that character of practice; but while I practiced in the inferior courts, if I had a bad case I abused the lawyer on the other side. That is what these gentlemen did this afternoon.

Now, I want to say to you gentlemen, both of you, and I have been closely connected with you for many years and you know me, and you will not be surprised when I say what I am going to say now—I have appeared on this floor for many years in debate, and I want to say to both of you gentlemen that you need not be afraid. I have declined in the past and I now again decline to descend to the level of debate that you occupied with such enthusiasm here this afternoon. [Applause.] I have nothing but the kindest things to say for these two gentlemen. They are men of the highest integrity. They are prompted by honest motives, both of them, from their viewpoint, but their viewpoint is not my viewpoint. The only thing I said about the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to which he now pretends to take exception—and I am glad he is here, so that he can deny what I say now if he wants to deny it—the only thing I said about him was that he was in the millionaire class. That was all, and the very next morning, just a few hours afterwards, the gentleman told me he considered that a compliment, and very kindly and very pleasantly thanked me for it. [Laughter.] Perhaps the gentleman wants to deny that now? I see the gentleman does not want to deny it.

For some months, and for even longer than that, in this country the representatives of the great financial interests have been demanding a tax upon sales, and they have been demanding it frankly. I recall now that Mr. Otto Kahn, in a carefully prepared pamphlet, which he distributed and sent perhaps to every Member of this House, called attention to the fact that if we could embark upon this method of taxation and get it thoroughly fixed upon the country, we would soon be able to collect from this source the enormous sum of $4,000,000,000 a year.

Now, I have nothing unkind to say about Mr. Otto Kahn. He is looking at things from his viewpoint—the viewpoint of men of great wealth. He and others like him frankly admit that if this kind of a tax is ever imposed in this country it will relieve the great income-tax payers from a large portion of the amount of taxes which they now pay. I am in receipt of communications from men who look at matters from that viewpoint and who insist that ultimately, if this tax is ever started in this country, it will be possible to abandon entirely our income system of levying taxes. Now, that is the viewpoint of the very rich and it is the viewpoint of the very wealthy Members of this House, who are in a position to control, and who do control the policy of the Republican majority. It is not the viewpoint from which I look at things. I believe in taxing the rich. I believe in placing a large part of this burden upon the rich, and upon those of the rich who profited by this war. It is the only way to carry through to their logical conclusion the theories of adjusted compensation.

In passing I want to say that the gentleman from Ohio, after having exhausted his own vituperative powers in personally assailing me, went back through the RECORD for over a decade and tried to find something unpleasant that somebody had said about me. He found something said by one who was properly retired from public life years ago, who is now at the head of a great trust company in New York City, and who, of course, has the viewpoint of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH]. Having found it, he proudly read it into the RECORD to-day.

Now, in connection with that episode, as many of you were not here at the time I want to say briefly this: I appeared on the floor and denounced five or six men who were trying to steal the forests of Panama, and I named the five or six and challenged them to deny it. They all admitted it but one, and I put their admissions in the RECORD. One of them denied it, and I put his denial, in all fairness, in the RECORD. As the result of that speech and that denunciation of this attempted theft from our ward on the Isthmus word was sent from the administration—although the administration was at that time exceedingly unfriendly to me—to the President and the Parliament of Panama to make no more extravagant grants of that kind. They had not even made it then; they had only in caucus determined to do it. But they rescinded their action and did not do it, and the Lumber Trust did not get the forests of Panama, and have not succeeded in getting them yet. [Applause.] They never will get them while I have the right to appear here on the floor and denounce their efforts. [Applause.]

Now, while these gentlemen are here I want to say something else and see whether they deny it or not. With wild acclaim they assert that if we wanted to take these great profits away from the men who made them, why did not we do it while the war was in progress. I want to hear either gentleman deny the statement I am now going to make.

We tried to make the rates on the larger incomes, individual and corporate, higher than we did, but we were compelled to abandon the effort because certain Republican members announced that they proposed to leave the committee and fight the bill on the floor. In the hour of peril to our country we had to abandon it; it required great effort and tact on the part of the Democratic members to even keep them in the committee room.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I voted for the very highest rates.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I am not charging the gentleman from Iowa with this, although I do not recall any strenuous support of our propositions on his part. I said certain Republican members. It was impossible to make the rate higher because there were certain Republican members on the committee who announced that they would leave the committee if that was done and would fight the bill on the floor, and we were compelled to abandon the effort. I do not hear any denial from either of the gentlemen who think they have answered my speech this afternoon.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Was not there a Democratic majority in that committee, and could not the majority have written any kind of a bill it desired to write?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Certainly, they could; but it was necessary to pass the bill through the House.

Mr. MONDELL. Why did they not do it?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Because it was an hour of danger for the country and we wanted the support of all the members of the committee.

Mr. CARTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. CARTER. Is it not a fact that there was not a Democratic majority of that House?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I think there was a very small Democratic majority, but not a majority upon which we could depend. There were some independents who voted with the Democrats at times.

Mr. CARTER. The Democrats had no majority in this House at that time.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I think the gentleman is right about it. Our control of the House was very slight indeed.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. There were 215 Republicans and 215 Democrats and 5 unattached.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I thank the gentleman from Missouri. Those were the facts and that was the reason why we had to appease Republicans as much as we could.

Now, all that I said in my speech was this: We want an opportunity on this floor to try to substitute a different tax from the sales tax. That is all, but you denounced that in unsparing terms to-day. I charged that the Republican steering committee, consisting of men of large wealth, controls the policy of that side of the House, and you have a sufficient majority to control the policy of this House, and you have not denied it and you can not deny it.

I charged that there are three Republican Members, also of large wealth, on the Ways and Means Committee, every one of them advocating this sales tax, and you have not denied that this afternoon, and you can not deny it.

I want to deny the statement made by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] that ever since he has been a member of that committee have the Democrats met and considered a bill in his absence. He had an opportunity to be present if he wanted to be there, always in full committee.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Was there any time during that period when a Member of the majority heard a Member of the minority say that it was their purpose to so influence legislation as to defeat it if possible?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Not that I know of.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman knows that the majority members of the Ways and Means Committee have had that statement made to them by minority members with regard to the legislation now under consideration.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I never heard of it.

Mr. MONDELL. I have.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Then why not give us an opportunity to vote on it? I can not understand what that has to do with the matter. There may be majority members——

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman make a practice of leaving the perfecting of that matter to those who have declared their opposition to the measure and their hope of dodging it?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. The gentleman knows my position on the matter. I expressed it plainly the other day. I am for the propositions of the American Legion. The only thing I am asking is that this House be given an opportunity to vote on the question as to whether it wants to tax war profits or not to any extent. That is our position, and you can not sidetrack it, and that is all there is to it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Yes.

Mr. RAYBURN. I would ask the gentleman this question: If the only possibility that he has heard of voting against the bill has not been because the Republicans will make it so bad with this sales tax that they can not vote for it?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I have heard that also.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will yield, I will say to my friend from Texas that that is not what I have heard at all.

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. I do not yield to the gentleman who desires to have a controversy with the gentleman from Texas. I have charged that your conduct on this soldiers' bill is partisan all the way through. I am not going to make the charge again, but I am just going to tell you what has happened. You gentlemen this afternoon have said that during the time I was permitted to meet with you this matter of taxing war profiteers was not seriously urged. All of you gentlemen know that I urged it from the start, and as soon as you found that I stood for that proposition, you quit inviting me to your conferences, and you excluded all of the rest of the Democratic members of the committee from your conferences and made the consideration of the most important part of your bill, the method of getting the money, a partisan matter. I want to say that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KITCHIN] stands with me on this question in spite of what the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has said here to-day. You say that it is insulting to say that you have been partisan in the matter. We have not had any meeting of the Democrats, we do not propose to have any caucus on this bill, we do not advocate any proposition that puts into effect objectionable rates that will make trouble through this country. Here is what you do and what you propose to do: The Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee meet alone behind locked doors with the experts of this Government to figure out these methods of sales taxes. In addition to that, you call a Republican caucus to meet this week in this room to force through, if you can, the bill you have prepared. In addition to all that, knowing the offensive, objectionable character of a sales tax, you frankly admit here this afternoon that you do not propose to put it into effect until December, and December is after the elections, and you refuse to give even your own side an opportunity to vote on this question as to whether or not war profiteers are to be compelled to contribute anything toward this fund. [Applause on Democratic side.] If that is not partisanship of the grossest and the most brazen kind, I would like to have somebody more gifted than I am tell me what it is.

I have introduced another bill. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] introduced this afternoon the same identical bill. I propose to print it in connection with my speech. It proposes a method of taxation that will reach the great corporations of the country, that will give them credit for all of the taxes they have paid during this war period, that will enable them to equalize their losses if there are any and yet will yield, if we want to make it yield that much, nearly $2,000,000,000—more than enough, you say, to meet the bill which in secret Republican caucus of the Ways and Means Committee are preparing.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Is that $2,000,000,000 in one year or two years?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. It depends upon the rate we impose and the length of time we conclude to try to extend it over.

Mr. RAMSEYER. Does not the bill provide for that?

Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY. Our position as to that will depend upon the character of the bill that these Republicans of the Ways and Means Committee in their secret caucus finally prepare. I am charged with discussing this matter from a partisan standpoint, when the only thing I did was to insist upon taxing great wealth. You say that is partisan. If that is partisan, thank God, I belong to no party which does not favor that proposition. You say there are officials closely connected with the Treasury Department who are opposed to the proposition to compel great corporations and individuals of large wealth, who made also tremendous profits out of the war, to pay the portion they ought to pay of taxes in this country. Then I want to say that upon that question I stand as independent as the leader on this side. I follow no leader, I care not to what party he may belong, who is opposed to levying a tax upon the war wealth of this country—upon the war profiteers. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Both gentlemen, who think they answered my arguments this afternoon, prepared carefully written statements. They read their speeches on the floor. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] read every word of his speech from a manuscript which he had previously given out to the public press. He very wisely announced before he commenced to read it that he would permit no interruptions. With reference to his statements and his misrepresentations of my speech on the floor, I desire to say that I have never before heard as many misstatements and misrepresentations condensed in a written speech no longer than the speech he delivered this afternoon. I am accustomed to these sort of tactics. Heretofore in this House I have been violently and personally assailed by Members who had not the facts or the ability to answer my arguments, and this has always occurred whenever I have assaulted entrenched privilege. There are always representatives of the interests on the floor on an occasion of that kind to indulge in personal abuse. I have experienced it before. It does not surprise me now.

Vehemently these gentlemen demand why I refused to vote to refer the soldiers' compensation bills to the Ways and Means Committee, the committee to which I belong. I refused to do it because I know the Republican members of the committee. I refused to do it because I knew it would result on their part in an effort to obtain a partisan advantage, and I was absolutely correct in my conclusions. These bills do not properly belong to the Ways and Means Committee. Seventy-five or eighty of them had been referred to other committes by the Speaker. They were assembled and taken away from the other committees and turned over to the Ways and Means Committee. It was a part of the Republican policy of this House. It was part of the policy of the millionaire Republican steering committee to turn over to the millionaire Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee and those other Republican members who follow them these bills. These gentlemen, every one of them responsible for this policy, are in that class who have the viewpoint of Otto Kahn and his asssociates. A man is not to be condemned because he has been successful in business in this country and has accumulated a large fortune. I congratulate those gentlemen who by their ability have been able to assemble large sums of money, and I congratulate the one gentleman on the Ways and Means Committee who is a millionaire and who answered me this afternoon not because he made himself his large fortune; he could not help it; he inherited it. I congratulate him upon his good fortune. The only thing I am calling attention to in these speeches is that these gentlemen look at matters of taxation from the standpoint of the very rich, and there never yet was a man, rich or poor, who willingly and enthusiastically submitted to be taxed. They all prefer to have the other fellow pay the taxes, and at the present time the very rich in this country are trying to establish a sales tax and to place the burden of paying this soldiers' compensation upon the great mass of the people of the United States, so that the man with the small income will pay as much of it as the man whose income is very large.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] called attention to the fact that in the hearings, and late during the hearings, I stated that I had not formed or expressed an opinion as to the character of tax that should be levied to pay this adjusted compensation, or as to whether or not there should be any adjusted compensation. I thank the gentleman for reading that extract from the hearings. I had forgotten it myself. We were sitting as a court to pass upon all questions involved in this controversy, and my conscience did not permit me to form or express any opinion as to the merits until the case was closed, and if I did not do it I am particularly proud of that record. Without intending to compliment me, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] has paid me the very highest compliment he could pay me. And I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio that while he did not so state during the hearings, he certainly did not openly express while the hearings were in progress, any opinion as to the merits of any element in the controversy.

When the hearings were closed I was in a position to state my opinion, and I did so in no uncertain terms, and expressed myself in favor of the soldiers' adjusted compensation according to the lines suggested by the American Legion, and I have endeavored to the very best of my ability to compel the rich to pay a part at least of this bonus. Every representative of a soldiers' organization who appeared before our committee and was questioned upon this point announced that he preferred that the adjusted compensation be paid out of the war profits of the rich.

You propose next Monday, without opportunity to amend, relying upon the popularity of the soldiers' adjusted compensation proposition to put through, after 40 minutes of debate, a bill which will involve a charge on the Treasury of $2,000,000,000, and the distribution of this immense sum, and which will involve other proposals which may cost still more money than this. I defy any Member of this House to find in all the precedents any attempt like this. This bill contemplates the collection of the largest amount of taxes ever imposed in one bill by any country in the history of the world, except one or two of the war bills which we passed while the war was in actual progress. And every one of those great war appropriation bills gave an opportunity for amendments. Never before in the history of legislative bodies in this country, or in any other country in the civilized world, has it ever been proposed to levy approximately $2,000,000,000 in taxes by various methods, without giving an opportunity to amend in any particular. I challenge the production of any precedent for this procedure. Strong-arm methods like this were never resorted to even in the days of Cannonism in this House.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] announced that my attempt to tax the great corporations and the rich war profiteers to pay any portion of this bonus is preposterous. Let me call attention merely to the fact that in 1917 the corporations then in existence in the United States were capitalized at $25,000,000,000. At the present time those identical corporations have passed over to surplus and increased their capital by the enormous sum of $10,000,000,000, and since that time new corporations have been formed which are capitalized at $5,000,000,000. In other words, in spite of the large dividends distributed, the capitalization of the corporations of the United States has increased in less than three years from $25,000,000,000 to the enormous sum of $40,000,000,000, and this enormous increase of $15,000,000,000 is due entirely to the war. Their war profiteering amounts to that enormous sum, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] insists that they should be tenderly dealt with, and that it is preposterous now to think of taxing them further for this purpose. Last year one individual in the United States reported an income of $34,000,000. How much his capital amounts to I will not even pretend to say. I know what his income was.

It was $34,000,000 last year. There are two men in the United States whose income last year was over $16,000,000. There are five men in the United States whose income last year was over $5,000,000 apiece. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] thinks it is preposterous to tax them. In 1914, before the war started, there were 60 men in the United States whose annual incomes were over $1,000,000 apiece. Last year there were 248 men in the United States whose incomes were over $1,000,000 apiece. In 1914 there were 114 men in the United States whose incomes were between $500,000 and $1,000,000 apiece. Last year there were 405 men in the United States whose incomes reached this immense sum. In 1914 there were 147 men in the United States whose incomes were between $300,000 and $400,000 apiece. To-day there are 400 men who enjoy that large income. In 1914 there were 130 men whose incomes exceeded $250,000 and was under $300,000. Now there are 350 who enjoy that income. In 1914 there were 233 men with an income between $200,000 and $250,000. Now there are 750 men who enjoy that income. In 1914 there were 406 men whose incomes exceeded $150,000 and was under $200,000. Now there are 1,300 men who enjoy that income; and I might go further showing the enormous increase in the number of men during the war who enjoyed these enormous incomes, whom the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] says it is preposterous to talk of taxing any further or taking away from them for the purpose of meeting these soldiers' just claims any part of their war-earned profits, and the millionaire steering committee of this House evidently thinks so, too, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] agrees most thoroughly with that proposition. And the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN], belonging, as he does, to an entirely different environment, yielding to the influences which surround him here in this House, agrees most thoroughly and enthusiastically with this method of protecting the rich. I do not mean that any man in this House, on either side, has been or could be influenced by improper methods, least of all the two gentlemen to whom I am replying in this speech, but the environment in which they are placed has developed in them those mental processes which had led them to the conclusions they now so strenuously defend.

The bill I introduced some time ago was prepared and introduced in order that it could be studied in committee, but the effect of it was to bring about the exclusion from the deliberations of the committee of every Democratic member on the committee. The gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] and myself, in pursuance of the agreement reached on the floor during my speech of last Thursday, have prepared a bill which has been carefully examined by the experts of the Treasury Department and the legal authorities and which will subject, if enacted into law, to the taxes proposed therein purely war profits after the payment of all taxes of great corporations to the amount of $3,800,000,000, and this does not include corporations whose income is under $100,000 a year, and they have made out of the war during the war years of 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, after they have paid all the taxes imposed upon them, the enormous sum of $3,800,000,000. This is the amount which we are trying to subject to taxes. The rate suggested in the bill we have introduced is 80 per cent of this amount. This will yield more than is necessary under the statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LONGWORTH] to meet the soldiers' bill, but I want to suggest to the Republican steering committee and to the Republican members of the Ways and Means Committee that about 12 per cent of this amount would equal the amount of the obnoxious sales tax they say they propose to inflict upon the country, and I am challenging them to give their own side an opportunity to say whether they would not prefer to collect $400,000,000 from war-profiteering corporations than to collect it from the farmers and laborers of the land. I do not expect the bill we have introduced to result in the collection of any substantial amount from individuals for any of the war years except for the year 1917, when the war profits of individuals were particularly large. The bill we have introduced will stand the test of the courts. If you will give us an opportunity to do so, we will amend your bill, that portion of it which taxes merchants' sales, by substituting for the amount such a tax will yield an equal amount of the war earnings of corporations, and we are willing for this House to say whether or not they prefer that tax to the sales tax for which you stand.

APPENDIX.

[Copy of a bill introduced by Mr. ROYAL C. JOHNSON, of South Dakota, and Mr. HENRY T. RAINEY, of Illinois, on this the 27th day of April, suggesting a method of approaching war profits of corporations with an income of $100,000 a year and over, and of individuals with an income of $20,000 a year and over, which can by applying a less rate than is indicated be substituted for any proposition to tax merchants' sales.]

A bill to provide revenue for the payment of adjusted compensation to the veterans of the World War.

Be it enacted, etc., That in addition to all other taxes there shall be levied, assessed, collected, and paid upon the net income of every individual and corporation for the taxable year 1920 a tax equal to 80 per cent of the war profits of such individual or corporation: Provided, That the tax hereby imposed on the net income of any individual or corporation shall in no case be greater than an amount which together with the income, war profits, and excess-profits taxes imposed by the revenue act of 1918 upon the net income of such individual or corporation for the taxable year 1920 equals 80 per cent of such net income.

SEC. 2. The tax imposed by section 1 shall not apply to any individual whose average net income for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 does not exceed $20,000, nor to any corporation whose average net income for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920 does not exceed $100,000.

SEC. 3. In the case of an individual the term "war profits" means the amount by which his average net income for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, less his average income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes for such years, exceeds his net income for the taxable year 1914.

SEC. 4. In the case of a corporation in existence during the prewar period the term "war profits" means the amount by which its average net income for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, less its average income, war-profits and excess-profits taxes for such years, exceeds its average net income for the prewar period plus or minus, as the case may be, 10 per cent of the difference between its average invested capital for the prewar period and its average invested capital for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920.

SEC. 5. In the case of a corporation not in existence during the whole of any one year during the prewar period the term "war profits" means the amount by which its average net income for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920, less its average income, war profits, and excess-profits taxes for such years, exceeds 10 per cent of its average invested capital for the taxable years 1917, 1918, 1919, and 1920.

SEC. 6. The tax imposed by this act shall be returned, assessed, collected, and paid upon the same basis, in the same manner, and subject to the same provisions of law, including penalties, as the taxes imposed by Titles II and III of the revenue act of 1918, and at the same time as therein provided for the return and payment of income taxes for the taxable year 1920.

SEC. 7. The Commissioner of Internal Revenue may grant a reasonable extension of time for the payment of the tax imposed by this act whenever in his judgment good cause exists and shall keep a record of every such extension and the reason therefor. No such extension shall be for more than 12 months. In case an extension of time is granted the taxpayer shall pay, in addition to the tax due, interest at the rate of one-half of 1 per cent per month on the amount of each installment not paid from the time the installment was due.

SEC. 8. As used in this act—

The term "corporation" includes associations, joint-stock companies, and insurance companies;

The term "taxable year" means the calendar year, or the fiscal year ending during such calendar year, upon the basis of which the net income is computed;

The term "fiscal year" means an accounting period of 12 months ending on the last day of any month other than December;

The term "prewar period" means the calendar years 1911, 1912, and 1913, or, if a corporation was not in existence during the whole of such period, then as many of such years during the whole of which the corporation was in existence; and

The net income of a corporation for the calendar years 1911, 1912, and 1913 and the average net income for the prewar period shall be determined in the manner provided in section 320 of the revenue act of 1918.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CARTER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, I ask the same privilege.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask permission to extend my remarks.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of these gentlemen?

Mr. MONDELL. On what subject, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. CARTER. On bonuses and the bonus bill.

Mr. BLANTON. I ask to extend my remarks on the question of politics.

Mr. MONDELL. Is it the gentleman's own remarks?

Mr. CARTER. My own remarks.

Mr. PARRISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks.

Mr. ROUSE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by printing a synopsis of current legislation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Oklahoma and the gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to extend their remarks on the bonus bill. Is there objection?

Mr. MONDELL. I did not understand the request of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. ROUSE. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a synopsis of certain legislation that has been passed by the Congress.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. Is there objection to the other requests? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of printing therein a list of such railroad companies as have accepted the guaranty and such railroads as have not done so. I think it is useful information to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. HARDY of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on bolshevism.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks on bolshevism. Is there objection?

Mr. BLANTON. Knowing the position of the gentleman, I will not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears none.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bonus bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks I made this day by inserting in the RECORD the table to which I referred, made by the Treasury experts.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

DIPLOMATIC AND CONSULAR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PORTER. Mr. Speaker, I present the conference report on the bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, for printing under the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11960) making appropriations for the Diplomatic and Consular Service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Ordered printed under the rule.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. TILSON, for one day, on account of death in family.

To Mr. FIELDS, indefinitely, on account of illness of his father.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 24 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned to meet to-morrow, Wednesday, April 28, 1920, at 12 o'clock noon.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PUBLIC BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the several calendars therein named, as follows:

Mr. REED of West Virginia, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11334) to amend an act incorporating Prospect Hill Cemetery, and for other purposes, reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 872), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SIMS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13665) granting the consent of Congress to Muskogee County, Okla., to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River, between sections 16 and 21, township 15 north, range 19 east, in the State of Oklahoma, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 873), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. STINESS, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13666) granting the consent of Congress to Muskogee County, Okla., to construct a bridge across the Arkansas River in section 18, township 12 north, range 21 east, in the State of Oklahoma, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 890), which said bill and report were referred to the House Calendar.

Mr. SWEET, from the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13558) for the purpose of improving the facilities and service of the Bureau of War Risk Insurance, and for further amending and modifying the war-risk insurance act, as amended, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 891), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. SINCLAIR, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13225) providing for the allotment of lands within the Fort Belknap Indian Reservation, Mont., and for other purposes, reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 894), which said bill and report were referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 9299) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of John F. Kelly reported the same with amendments, accompanied by a report (No. 874), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13777) for the relief of James R. McGuire, reported the same with an amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 875), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

He also, from the same committee, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 788) for the relief of John Minahan, alias John Bagley, reported the same without amendment, accompanied

SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, April 28, 1920.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we lift our hearts in reverent devotion and worship to Thee, the author of every good and perfect gift. We thank Thee for the marvelous resources Thou hast put at our command, and we seek Thy divine guidance in their use. We remember that our freedom is the worst of slavery if we do not use it aright, and our resources but lower and degrade unless they are dedicated to the highest possible uses. Grant us this day the constant vision of Thy face that we may work as in the presence of God and do the things that are pleasing in Thy sight. We ask it for Christ's sake. Amen.

The Assistant Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when on request of Mr. CURTIS, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. JONES of Washington presented a telegram in the nature of a petition from the Washington Coal Operators' Association, praying for the passage of the so-called anti-dumping bill, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. GERRY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] are absent on official business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-seven Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present.

Mr. KELLOGG. Mr. President, I send to the desk a bill to prevent the unauthorized landing of submarine cables in the United States, and I ask the privilege of making a few remarks explaining the measure.

I introduce the bill by request. I am not prepared to say that I indorse it or will support it, but I do think the circumstances surrounding the cable situation in South America should receive the attention of the Senate, and that the Committee on Interstate Commerce ought to have a hearing and carefully consider this subject.

The bill proposes to give the Secretary of State the power to issue licenses for cable landings. This power has been exercised, but some question has been raised as to the right of the Secretary of State to grant such licenses upon conditions which will protect the United States. That is all the bill proposes to do.

But, Mr. President, there is a situation in South America which is the cause of this bill being prepared and introduced which I think the Senate should understand. The All-American Cable Co. is an American line. It owns a line of cables from New York to Cuba, from Cuba to Panama, and down the west coast of South America to Valparaiso, across from Valparaiso to Montevideo, and two lines from Montevideo to places in Brazil, Rio Janeiro, and Santos. It also owns the cable line up the coast of Mexico and to Galveston. This is the only all-American cable line to South America.

An English company, known as the British Co., has practically a monopoly of the Brazilian cable business. The All-American Cable Co. has two lines to places in Brazil; but in 1873 the Brazilian Government granted to the British Co. the exclusive privilege of laying cables between points in Brazil for a period of 60 years. Subsequently, however, it was claimed that this monopoly only extended to points reached by the British Co., and the All-American Co. was allowed to lay two cables from Montevideo, one to Rio de Janeiro and the other to Santos, but they had to lay two cables; they could not go to Santos and from Santos to Rio de Janeiro. To-day this British Co. has practically a monopoly in Brazil, and the Brazilian Government has placed against the All-American Cable Co. a discriminatory tariff, whereby a tax of 3 francs a word is imposed against cables going from Brazil to the United States by the Pacific coast, so that the British Co. under this system will have an absolute monopoly of the Brazilian cable business.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator permit me a question right there?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. KING. Have representations been made to the Brazilian Government by our Government or by any of our diplomatic representatives in respect to that discrimination? Have they made any protest against it or have they made any request for relief?

Mr. KELLOGG. I think so, but I am not familiar with the correspondence. I think, however, when the Brazilian Government granted the right to build these two cable lines they did so at the request of the American Government. I am not familiar, however, with the diplomatic correspondence on the subject and have not had time to look it up.

It is now proposed that the British Co. shall extend a line from Brazil to the Barbados—British islands—and that the American Western Union Co. shall extend to the Barbados to meet the British Co. lines, and that they will have together a monopoly of the business to Brazil, which would practically shut out the All-American line. The All-American line objects to this. I am not stating whether it is wise or unwise; it may be that it is the only way that the Western Union Co. can get into Brazil, but it seems to me unfortunate that the American cable business to Brazil must be handled over a British line, and that all our diplomatic and commercial business must necessarily go over a British line.

Mr. McCORMICK. Will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes.

Mr. McCORMICK. Is it not true that American enterprise is ready to lay a cable from the United States to Brazil if not estopped by the Brazilian Government under the alleged terms of existing concession?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes. I understand that both the Western Union and the All-American Co. are anxious to lay cables to Brazil and to all other South American points.

The line to be built by the Western Union proposes to run from Barbados to Miami, Fla., and it is a question whether the Secretary of State has authority to place conditions upon the landing rights of the Western Union Co.

Mr. President, this country controls direct cables to Europe and direct cables to the Orient.

Mr. McCORMICK. One of them.

Mr. KELLOGG. All of them.

Mr. McCORMICK. The Senator does not mean that it controls the Canadian oriental cable?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I mean the cables from the United States. South America is a continent in which we must look for the greatest expansion of American trade, and if we are going to carry on that trade we must have not only ships and banking facilities but cable facilities as well. We ought to be able to reach South American ports over our own lines, not over any foreign lines. I am, however, simply introducing this bill so that the subject may come before the Senate.

I do not vouch for the statement that the British company is willing to make a contract which will give the Western Union all of the business from Brazil and practically shut out the All-American Co. It may be that the Western Union is powerless. However, it would be unfortunate if any of the American cable lines should be shut out of any South American country.

Mr. McCORMICK. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, it is alleged that the materials necessary for the laying of the cables, and which are controlled by British manufacturers, will be withheld from the Western Union unless they agree to this proposed juncture of the lines at the Barbados.

Mr. KELLOGG. That may be true; I am not advised as to that. I presume it is somewhat difficult to get such materials. We are now, I understand, in this country ourselves preparing to manufacture cables. Heretofore we have been dependent upon British manufacturers.

Mr. President, when the first all-American cable line went to South America the rates for cabling were over $7 a word, as I recall; I think the rate was about $7.50 a word. The rates have gradually been reduced until to-day they are 50 cents a word, and since the All-American cables were built to two points in Brazil the New York rate has been reduced from 85 cents to 65 cents. It may be that the most economical and the only way is to make a joint arrangement with the British cable line; but it seems to me the subject should be investigated by the Interstate Commerce Committee and that if legislation is necessary it should be passed.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does the Senator mean the Interstate Commerce Committee?

Mr. KELLOGG. I mean the Committee on Interstate Commerce of the Senate.

Mr. McCORMICK. Does not the Senator mean the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. KELLOGG. No; I mean the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. KELLOGG. Certainly.

Mr. JONES of Washington. Has the Senator made any inquiries or obtained any information from the State Department with reference to the exclusive concessions granted by South American countries to British or other foreign interests?

Mr. KELLOGG. Yes; I have with me, I think, the grant made by the Brazilian Government to the British company in 1873, which is an exclusive grant.

Mr. JONES of Washington. I have understood that there were several exclusive grants not only in South America but in China and other oriental countries. It has seemed to me that if our State Department is not taking active steps toward trying to influence South American countries not to grant these exclusive privileges to other nations it ought to do so. It seems to me that it ought to be able to accomplish a great deal in that direction and possibly might make arrangements under which landing privileges could be secured.

I will say that the Committee on Commerce of the Senate has held quite extensive hearings with reference to the trans-Pacific cable possibilities in connection with a bill which has been introduced looking toward Government construction of a cable across the Pacific. It has been disclosed that we may have some difficulty in getting landing rights over there. I do not know just what the State Department has done, but it has seemed to me that the State Department ought to get active along those lines and that it might be able to be of very great service in connection with this very important matter, because, as the Senator has said, the expansion of our commerce, especially in the Pacific and in the Orient, at any rate, is very largely dependent upon our soon getting additional cable communication.

Mr. KELLOGG. I quite agree with the Senator. I looked into the subject to some extent when the Government took over the cable lines, but I have not had time thoroughly to investigate the question of landing rights in other countries.

The bill (S. 4301) to prevent the unauthorized landing of submarine cables in the United States was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

NAVAL APPROPRIATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT (at 12 o'clock and 28 minutes p. m.). The morning business is closed. The calendar under Rule VIII is in order.

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the naval appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 13108) making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1921, and for other purposes.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, on yesterday afternoon I asked to have the naval appropriation bill go over in order to dispose of two amendments which the committee had not fully prepared. I now desire to offer an amendment which appears in printed form, but I wish slightly to modify the amendment before it is read. On page 4, in line 10, after the word "Medical," I desire to strike out the word "or," and after the word "Dental" to strike out the word "Corps" and insert "or Civil Engineering Corps," so as to read:

Appointed to the Medical, Dental, or Civil Engineering Corps.

With that slight change in phraseology, I now submit the amendment and move its adoption.

I ought to say by way of explanation that it carries no appropriation, but is designed to cover the relations of temporary appointees in the Navy to the permanent Navy. It is very essential that the amendment should be acted upon at this time. I may add that the proposed reservations were first brought to us by the House, who are very anxious to have this amendment put on, and it is also recommended by the department.

Mr. KING. I ask to have the amendment read.

Mr. THOMAS. Before the amendment is read, I desire to give notice that at the appropriate time I shall move to strike out all beginning with the word "That," on line 3 of page 55, down to and including the word "and" on line 15.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment submitted by the Senator from Massachusetts.

The ASSISTANT SECRETARY. It is proposed to add as a new section, at the end of the bill, the following:

SEC. —. That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to employ on active duty, with their own consent, members of the Naval Reserve Force in enlisted ratings, the number so employed not to exceed during any fiscal year the average of 20,000 men: Provided, That the number of naval reservists so employed on active duty, together with the total number of enlisted men in the Regular Navy, shall not exceed the total enlisted strength of the Navy as authorized by law: Provided further, That such members of the Naval Reserve Force so employed shall serve on active duty for not less than 12 nor more than 18 months unless sooner released: And provided further, That the number of commissioned officers of the line, permanent, temporary, and reserve on active duty, shall not exceed 4 per cent of the total authorized enlisted strength of the Regular Navy, and the number of staff officers shall be in the same proportions as authorized by existing law: Provided further, That 500 reserve officers are also authorized to be employed in the aviation and auxiliary service: And provided further, That temporary appointments may be continued or hereafter made, in the discretion of the President, not to exceed the number allowed in any grade or rank based upon the total permanent and temporary commissioned strength of the line or any staff corps: And provided further, That nothing herein shall be construed as reducing the permanent, commissioned or enlisted, strength of the Regular Navy as authorized by existing law.

SEC. —. That officers holding temporary commissioned and warrant ranks in the Navy and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks shall be eligible for transfer to and appointment in the permanent grades or ranks in the Navy for which they may be found qualified not above that held by them on the date of transfer, but not to exceed a total of 1,200 commissioned officers in the line, of which number 500 may be appointed from the Naval Flying Corps, with proportionate number in all staff corps as now authorized by law, except that the Medical, Dental, and Supply Corps shall be entitled to such additional numbers as are necessary to make up the full quota of officers in those corps, as now authorized by law: Provided, That officers so appointed shall take rank in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank, and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks found qualified for a given rank shall be arranged according to their precedence among themselves and commissioned in the permanent service next after the lowest temporary officer who qualifies for the same rank and is appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

SEC. —. That in addition to the number of transfers and appointments hereinbefore allowed, commissioned warrant officers of more than 15 years' service since date of warrant or date of first appointment as paymaster's clerk or mate, who have creditably served in the war with the German Government in temporary commissioned ranks or grades in the Regular Navy, may be appointed to a permanent rank or grade for which they may be qualified not above the temporary rank or grade held by them at the time of transfer and shall take rank therein in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank: Provided, That no transfers or appointments made in accordance with the foregoing provisions of this act shall be to a higher grade or rank than lieutenant in the Navy.

SEC. —. That officers appointed under any of the foregoing provisions shall be not more than 35 years of age when so appointed to the line of the Navy, Construction Corps, Civil Engineering Corps, or Supply Corps, and not more than 38 years of age when so appointed to the Corps of Chaplains, or 40 years of age when so appointed to the Medical, Dental, or Civil Engineering Corps: Provided, That said age limits shall be increased in the cases of officers who have rendered prior service as paymaster's clerks, or as mates, or as warrant or commissioned officers in the naval service to the extent of such prior service: Provided further, That officers originally appointed to the Dental Corps above the said age limits shall be eligible for appointment and promotion under this act irrespective of age: And provided further, That officers of the line of the Navy who are appointed thereto pursuant to this act from sources other than the Naval Academy shall not be ineligible for promotion by reason of age as prescribed by the act of August 29, 1916 (39 Stats., p. 579), until they have rendered 10 years' service in the grade of lieutenant commander, 6 years' service in the grade of commander, or 8 years' service in the grade of captain, respectively, upon the completion of which service such officers, if then ineligible for promotion by reason of age, shall be retired in accordance with said act: And provided further, That until June 30, 1923, promotions to lieutenant (junior grade) and lieutenant may be made without regard to length of service: And provided further, That until June 30, 1923, officers of the permanent Navy who have served satisfactorily during the war with the German Government in a temporary grade or rank shall be eligible under the provisions of existing law for selection for promotion or for promotion to the same permanent grade or rank without regard to statutory requirements other than age and professional and physical examination: And provided further, That in making reductions in rank as may be required by this act officers holding temporary appointments may be given temporary appointments in lower grades, and officers so appointed shall take precedence from the dates of their original appointments in such lower grades.

SEC. —. That in case any enlisted man or enrolled man who, since the 11th day of November, 1918, has been or hereafter shall be discharged from any branch or class of the naval service for the purpose of reenlisting in the Navy, or heretofore has extended or hereafter shall extend his enlistment therein, he shall be entitled to the payment of the $60 bonus provided in section 1406 of the act entitled "An act to provide revenue, and for other purposes," approved February 24, 1919, and to travel pay as authorized in section 3 of the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1919: Provided, That only one bonus shall be paid to the same person.

SEC. —. That that part of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the naval service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1920, and for other purposes," approved July 11, 1919, which reads as follows: "Until June 30, 1920, enlistments in the Navy may be for terms of two, three, or four years, and all laws now applicable to four-year enlistments shall apply, under such regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Navy, to enlistments for a shorter period with proportionate benefits upon discharge and reenlistment," be, and hereby is, amended by striking out the words "until June 30, 1920," and adding the words "and the Marine Corps."

SEC. —. That section 125 of the act entitled "An act for making further and more effectual provisions for the national defense, and for other purposes," approved June 3, 1916, shall hereafter be in full force and effect as originally enacted, notwithstanding anything contained in the act entitled "An act permitting any person who has served in the United States Army, Navy, or Marine Corps in the present war to retain his uniform and personal equipment and to wear the same under certain conditions," approved February 28, 1918: Provided, That the words "or the Secretary of the Navy" shall be inserted immediately after the words "the Secretary of War" wherever those words appear in section 125 of the act approved June 3, 1916, hereinbefore referred to.

SEC. —. That hereafter the Secretary of the Navy may, in his discretion, withhold any part or all of the retainer pay which may be due a member of the Naval Reserve Force where such members fail to perform such duty as may be prescribed by law for the maintenance of the efficiency of the Naval Reserve Force: Provided, That any money so withheld shall be credited to the appropriation for organizing and administering the Naval Reserve Force to be used for any purpose that the Secretary of the Navy may consider proper to increase the efficiency of the Naval Reserve Force: Provided further, That hereafter the minimum amount of active service required for the maintenance of the efficiency of the Fleet Naval Reserve shall be the same as for the Naval Reserve.

SEC. —. That the age limits for promotion by selection, which, under existing law, will become effective on June 30, 1920, are hereby deferred until June 30, 1921.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I should like to have some explanation of this amendment. It seems so far-reaching in its effects that I think we are entitled to have an explanation of it.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if we had had the good fortune to have had the Senator from Utah with us in the committee he would appreciate that it is not so far-reaching as it appears. The main object is to settle the relations of the temporary appointments, and that is something which must be done at once. For instance, there is a law now on the statute books which extended their service. It has been twice extended, and it was extended the last time to the 30th of June. If it is not further extended we shall lose 1,200 reserve officers at this time whose places will be impossible to fill now. We must keep those reserve officers to carry on the Navy.

There are other provisions relating to the temporary appointment which it is necessary to make to establish their relations with the permanent Navy. What I first spoke of, the last section, is the one covering that feature, and there is another in the body of the bill covering it, allowing them to be continued temporarily for a year.

There is a clause in the amendment in regard to wearing the uniform. They now have the right under certain conditions to wear the uniform of the United States after they are discharged, and there are unworthy persons who take advantage of that privilege. There is a provision of law by which the Secretary of War has control over that matter in the Army, that it shall not be permitted unless it has the approval of the Secretary. This is simply putting the Navy on the same basis as the Army.

I think all the other provisions relate to establishing the relations between the temporary appointments made by the act of 1917 and the acts subsequent thereto. It establishes them on a proper basis now, in relation to the permanent fleet in peace time, and it is absolutely essential that this should be done.

We have modified this amendment somewhat. In its original form it was brought to us by the House committee after the bill had practically gone through the Senate. It was also strongly recommended by the Navy Department and the Bureau of Navigation, and I can assure the Senator that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] and I have given many hours to trying to get it in proper shape, and we have left out a good many things which we thought had better go over.

Except by going into it in very great detail, there really is nothing more to be said about the amendment. The Senator from Virginia, who knows the amendment even better than I do, I am sure can make a statement in regard to it, if the Senator from Utah desires it.

Mr. KING. I will be satisfied with the explanation of the Senator from Massachusetts if I can direct his attention to just one thought. A number of persons have been to see me, as a member of the committee, with reference to this proposed amendment. The criticism they made was that they were apprehensive it would prevent, or at least delay, the bringing into the Navy of officers and men for the regular service in contradistinction to temporary service.

Mr. LODGE. It has no effect on that whatever.

Mr. KING. If I may be permitted to continue, they were afraid that preferences would be given to these temporary officers, so that it would discourage the enlistment of men who would be inclined to go into the Navy for life.

Mr. LODGE. I can assure the Senator that there is nothing in that objection. This leaves the regular force just where it is. The regular force is far below the necessities at the present time, and we must have temporary men. But no injustice is done the regular service.

Mr. SWANSON rose.

Mr. LODGE. I am sure the Senator from Virginia will say the same thing.

Mr. SWANSON. Mr. President, the first section of this amendment authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to take 20,000 of the naval reserves and put them in the Regular Navy. The enlistments have been so poor in the Regular Navy that it authorizes the Secretary to transfer 20,000 men to make up the authorized strength of the Regular Navy, which is now 137,800 men. This amendment does not change the number at all which was fixed last year. We have refused to change that this year, although there are more battleships which will come into commission. We think that some of these ships can be supplied with a smaller quota of men and some of them can be retired and put out of commission, but in case an emergency comes, with a naval reserve force of 250,000 men we will be equipped for any war which may arise anywhere in the near future.

So the first provision authorizes the Secretary of the Navy to take 20,000 of the naval reserves and enlist them for a limited time to make up the deficiency, where they have not been able to get the required enlistments in the Navy.

As everybody knows, there has been a general complaint that enlistments have not been large enough to keep the Navy up to proper strength. That is very important. In doing that we do not increase the number of officers.

Some Senators seem to have the idea that this means an increase in the number of officers. The number of officers for the Navy was fixed in the law of 1916, when the Navy was entirely reorganized. Under the law approved August 18, 1916, the number of officers in the Navy of all classes—admirals, lieutenants, ensigns, and all—is fixed at 4 per cent of the enlisted strength of the Navy. That was thought to be the least number of officers they could get along with. So, with an authorized strength of 137,800, there could be 4,512 officers. During the war there were about 450,000 men in the Navy. The number has been reduced now to 137,000. Before 1917 the strength of the Navy was 54,000 men. That has been increased now on account of the increased number of ships and various lines of work to 137,000.

There is a deficiency in officers. That is, we have not been able to get graduates from the Naval Academy to make up the 4 per cent, and we passed a law permitting those of the Naval Reserve who can stand the examination to be appointed as officers in the Navy to make up that deficiency.

Young men went to Annapolis and went to these training schools and made up the deficiency caused by the increase in the number of men to 450,000. When we reduced the Navy to 137,000 we still were deficient in graduates from the Naval Academy. We lacked nearly 2,000 graduates from the Naval Academy to fill up the requirements of the Navy in the matter of officers.

To cure that, last year we enacted a law permitting the Secretary of the Navy to make up the deficiency by making temporary appointments, after examination and selection. That law will expire on the 30th of June, the number not yet exceeding the 4 per cent fixed by the law of 1916. Unless that law is continued, on the 30th of June, when it will expire, there will be a deficiency of 2,000 officers in the Navy and it will be utterly impossible to man the Navy with a deficiency of 2,000 officers. This amendment is designed to continue these temporary appointments. A great many of the best temporary men are disposed to resign because they can not become permanent in the Navy—in the Paymaster General's Department, in the Engineering Department, and in other branches. Some of the officers have shown themselves to be good officers; some of them are good seamen, who came from the shipping service. So, in order to keep the best men, the Navy has insisted that these temporary men should have an opportunity to stand qualified examinations and that there be authority to transfer 1,200 into the Regular Navy to make up this deficiency, which number the department has not been able to obtain from the Naval Academy.

There is a deficiency now in the Navy. There is no change in the law as to the number of officers and no change in the pay of the officers by this amendment. There is no change in the percentage of admirals, captains, commanders, and lieutenant commanders.

It had been hoped that this matter could be taken care of by a separate bill passed through the House and the Senate, and not have it taken care of by an amendment to the appropriation bill; but those in the House in touch with the situation have informed us that they will not be able to get through a bill in time, if Congress shall adjourn early in June, to permit that legislation to be passed at this session, and if that legislation is not passed at this session the Navy will be absolutely demoralized by losing 2,000 of these officers.

That is all this amendment will do. Last year we extended the law for one year. This will extend it, with the other provisions, to let the best temporary men come into the Navy permanently, as they do in the Army. It is such a provision as there is with regard to the Army, where officers proved themselves worthy in France or have proved themselves worthy in the service. It is as is provided in the Marine Corps. After proper examination they can be transferred into the Navy, but we do not allow any of them to be transferred to a higher rank than they have. None of them can be transferred, I believe, to a rank higher than that of commander; at any rate, it is not a very high rank, and they can be transferred only after examination.

With that situation before us, I hope no Senator will make a point of order against the amendment. If any Senator should make a point of order, he will take the responsibility for the Navy being entirely demoralized on account of an insufficient number of officers after the 30th of June.

Mr. KING. Will the Senator yield? I am quite satisfied with this provision; but, as I stated to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], several persons of naval experience have complained to me that they were afraid this provision would be used for the purpose of elevating into positions men who are now in the Reserve Corps, and that that would deter men from entering who would like to come into the service and make it a life work.

Mr. SWANSON. No; that is not the case.

Mr. KING. They were apprehensive that it would be converted to that purpose.

Mr. SWANSON. The provision on page 3 takes care of that. The bill as originally introduced did not, but if the Senator will look on page 3 of the amendment he will find this provision, which takes care of that situation, a provision which we put in yesterday:

Provided, That officers so appointed shall take rank in accordance with their precedence while holding temporary rank, and members of the Naval Reserve Force of commissioned and warrant ranks found qualified for a given rank shall be arranged according to their precedence among themselves and commissioned in the permanent service next after the lowest temporary officer who qualifies for the same rank and is appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Under that provision a graduate of the Naval Academy who went into the Navy permanently can never be preceded by one of these temporary officers. We put that provision in because we thought it was but justice to those who had qualified themselves and held rank in the permanent Navy that they should have that privilege and that right, which is accorded by the provision on page 3, lines 6 to 14. That obviates the objection alluded to by the Senator.

BOLSHEVISM IN THE UNITED STATES AND RUSSIA.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, again there has been a strike in the mines at Butte, Mont., that nesting place of I. W. W., Bolshevists, and other anarchists, where they appear to flourish with impunity and immunity, and, unless countermanded since the latest news from there, it is still more or less in force. I assume it is. It is one of the numerous miners' strikes that have afflicted that long-suffering community at frequent intervals for a number of years. It is the second miners' strike there in less than a year. It was ordered by the I. W. W., Bolshevists, and other anarchists, who are bent upon destroying all industry and all government.

This strike was ordered and put in force, too, notwithstanding the fact that last fall the miners' unions of Butte, through their duly authorized officials and leaders, whose actions were duly ratified by the unions, entered into a contract with the mine operators, and a complete agreement and understanding, duly signed and executed, as to wages and working conditions, with which the unions expressed satisfaction. At the time the contract was executed the representatives of the unions congratulated the miners upon the liberal terms and fair provisions of their contract and complimented the mine operators upon their liberality and upon their fair, square dealing. Mutual satisfaction was expressed, and it was believed there would be no more trouble, a long strike having just ended.

By the terms of the contract the very lowest wage paid to any person working in a mine was to be, I believe, $5.75 per day. Wages provided for ranged from that sum up to a much higher figure. The eight-hour day was retained. The contract, I know, was to continue in force for at least one year from last fall, and maybe longer; perhaps two or three years; I know not less than one year.

Only about six months have elapsed. The contract is in force. It has at least six months yet to continue in force. Yet there occurs another strike. No demands have been made on the operators. It is reported that the strikers say they want a minimum wage of $7 per day and a workday of six hours and the discharge of all so-called "political" prisoners anywhere imprisoned in this country. I fail to see any reason for making wage contracts if they are to be thus ruthlessly broken.

Undoubtedly the great majority of the miners did not and do not want a strike. Undoubtedly the great majority of them are satisfied and want to work. The strike was ordered and put in force and effect by a small minority of the miners who are reds, radicals, and I. W. W.'s, and are criminals at heart. Not satisfied with quitting work, they took possession of the city, the largest mining camp in the United States, and inaugurated a reign of lawlessness, force, and terror. They would not work nor permit any work by others who wanted to work. There are thousands of miners who are peaceable and law-abiding who wanted to continue work, but the thugs, sluggers, desperadoes, and criminals among the strikers, by assaulting and slugging all miners who reported for work and by force, violence, and terror, completely closed down the mines; and this in boasted free America!

The local authorities appeared to be helpless. Butte, a city of 100,000 population, was for several days in the hands of a mob. The mob roamed the city at will. Street cars loaded with peaceful miners who wanted to work and were en route to mines were stopped, assaulted, and turned back. Street car traffic was suspended. Miners in street cars going to work were compelled to alight and go back. For several days the mines were picketed by the lawless and none allowed to work. The picketers did not resort to moral suasion; they used slugging and force as their arguments. There were violent clashes followed by bloodshed. Firearms were used. Strikers were armed. Twelve or fourteen thousand men were thrown out of work, forcibly kept from working.

For several days this reign of terror prevailed in Butte. Federal troops have been sent to Butte, and I assume order will now be preserved and lawlessness in large measure stopped. I assume those miners who want to work will now be given some protection. The strikers declare, however, that the strike is still in force and will continue.

What the Government will do beyond keeping temporary order by the use of troops, what it will do to go to the bottom of this nest of anarchy and root out the moving forces of it, I do not know; judging by the past, not much, I fear. There is one thing that the Government appears to be extremely reluctant to do, and that is to measure strength to a final test with any organized body of persons affiliated with organized labor or calling themselves a branch of organized labor.

The Government may promise to do so, may threaten to do so, may start to do so, but when the time for the actual test comes it seems there is almost certain to be by the Government compromise, concession, promise of investigation, yielding, or some other way found of avoiding the test. There will continue to be trouble in Butte until there is a clean-out there.

This strike fever all over the country will continue until employers adopt the policy of filling strikers' places, and when the strikers tire of striking and return to work, telling them there is no employment for them. So long as men may strike when they please and return to work when they please this hysteria of striking will continue. Of course, the policy of refusing work to returning strikers would be followed by violence, but in that event the Government should protect employers and those who take the places of strikers. I believe many employers would adopt this policy if they thought the Government would protect them and those whom they might put to work, but they will not do it, because they feel the Government would not back them.

I am sure the motive of the strikers in Butte is to bedevil and pester the operators and prevent any from working in the mines until the operators are compelled to close the mines. Then the reds and radicals would expect a complacent and tolerant Government to take over the mines and turn them over to the Bolshevists to operate and loot for their own benefit. I have no doubt that is their object.

I am satisfied this lawless strike in Butte is only part and parcel of a widespread plan to keep up strike after strike until there is a universal, country-wide strike, followed by the taking over of all industries and the sovietization of this country. I am sure the majority of the workmen do not want it, but a lot of reds, radicals, and agitators are working for it, and, I think, in many instances are using the strike and are misleading thousands of deluded workingmen as a means to their end. Already there is in this country a widespread movement to have the Government take over the railroads and turn them over to the employees to operate for their benefit. I am sure reds and radicals are taking advantage of this movement to get in their mischievous work.

The Attorney General of the United States says that the recent railroad strike, which covered almost the entire country, and which is still hanging on and showing symptoms of revival, was instigated by radicals, reds, and Bolshevists, who aim at the overthrow of our Government, and I have no doubt he knows whereof he speaks. The Department of Justice has an adequate force of agents and detectives, and a goodly number of them are at all times in the field. It has every facility for discovering the schemes of enemies of the Government and trailing their work. During the strike handbills, addressed to "Railway men and port workers," were distributed among the strikers and those railway men and port workers who remained at work in the chief transportation centers. They were signed by the "Central Revolutionary Council of America." They were worded as follows:

Strike to put an end to the whole capitalist system! Strike to take over the industries and the country for the benefit of the workers, and the workers alone! * * * Your workers' councils and your one big revolutionary union must get ready to fight the United States Government. Prepare to take over the Government and run it for the benefit of the workers alone.

While it is probable most of the men who engaged in that strike had no knowledge of the sinister influences behind it, I have no doubt the leaders of it and those who were responsible for it were working in conjunction with enemies of the Government. In fact, I believe a great many of the frequent strikes with which the country has been afflicted of recent months are, so far as concern those who instigate them, in line with the general policy and purpose of the Bolshevists and other anarchists of the country to disrupt industry, upset the country, and delude workingmen, and to lead up to the formation of the one big union, which is the shibboleth of enemies of the Government, and to the universal strike, which is constantly kept in mind and aimed at by all who would overturn all government and bring conditions of anarchy and chaos. I have no doubt there are at least a million and perhaps three or four million people in this country who want to see our Government overthrown and who are engaged more or less actively in scheming to that end or encouraging those who are doing such scheming. I have no doubt there are in this country at least a million foreign-born people, mostly aliens, who want to see our Government overthrown, and most of whom belong to some society or organization having that object.

It has been estimated that in New York City there are 500,000 people who are opposed to our form of government and want to see it overthrown, and that each week there are as many as two or three dozen meetings in that city, having for their purpose the arousing of opposition to our form of government. Much of this estimate is based on the investigations of the Lusk investigating committee, a committee of the New York Legislature, which spent weeks in the investigation of disloyal conditions and sentiments in that city. The widespread sympathy or semi-sympathy in this country with the Soviet Government of Russia is alarming. It appears to pervade all classes of people and all ranks of society. It appears to have some hold in colleges and schools. It has adherents in the ranks of fashion. It has some adherents among the well-to-do and intelligent. It is astounding that some people who appear to be educated, intelligent, native Americans will express more or less sympathy with the Soviet Government of Russia. I have encountered some of it which has amazed me.

When Alexander Berkman and Emma Goldman, with a lot of other anarchists, were deported from this country an indignation meeting in protest against their deportation was held at Boston, and seated on the stage, giving the meeting the support of their presence and sympathy, the prestige of their participation, and joining in the applause, were some wealthy and fashionably dressed women of Boston, who hesitated not to parade themselves before the public as being in sympathy with Berkman and Goldman and their fellow anarchists and to make known their protest against the deportation of such scoundrels.

Sympathy with bolshevism seems to be getting a hold in the public-school system of parts of the country. There are sporadic instances of it which should serve as a warning of what may be found more extensively under cover. It is reported that about a year ago a teacher in one of the public schools of Washington, in talking on current topics to her pupils, expressed a tolerant feeling for bolshevism, and undertook to give "the other side," the pleasing side, of bolshevism, and instead of unsparingly condemning it, warned her pupils that they should not be too quick to condemn bolshevism. To my mind this is horrible, shocking. So far as I know, this charge has never been denied. The school board of the District of Columbia took cognizance of it and undertook to discipline that teacher for her shockingly indiscreet expressions.

It is understood that she acknowledged making them, and the infliction of discipline followed by order of the board. A great furore about the infliction of the discipline was aroused by many of the teachers of the District. The cause of the disciplined teacher was taken up by the teachers' unions of the District and by the labor unions of the District. A great protest was made, and soon thereafter two of the members of the board, who were chiefly instrumental in disciplining the offending teacher, resigned. Apparently their positions were made uncomfortable for them. That teacher is still teaching in the public schools of the District. I understand the president of the school board defends her.

There are hundreds of publications in the United States which are openly praising the Soviet Government of Russia or advocating the overthrow of our Government, or doing both. Many of them are printed in foreign languages and circulate among the ignorant, prejudiced, easily misled class of foreigners, most of whom can read no language other than their own and rely upon their foreign-language papers for all of their information and guidance. It is impossible to know what these foreign-language periodicals are publishing unless their articles are translated into English. To keep track of their publications and translate their every utterance is a tremendous task. Department of Justice officials, I believe, undertake it, but it imposes an undue burden on them. The publishers should be required to print their publications in English or suspend. There is in my State a daily paper which, I am informed, continually praises the Soviet Government of Russia and holds it up as a model.

I believe there are many people who express feelings of leniency for or sympathy with the Soviet Government of Russia who do not know anything about it, do not know what it is. I believe there are millions of people in this country who are indifferent to it, who have no knowledge whatever of the character of that Government.

All the while emissaries in this country of that Government are "boring from within" and injecting the insidious poison of their virus into the veins of our body politic, misleading credulous people and doing incalculable harm. I think the American people need to be aroused. The people appear to be asleep to the dangers that are in their very midst and which are daily growing. I think the people of the United States should be awakened from their lethargy and made to know something of the Government which is daily being loudly praised in this country as superior to our own time-tried and tested Government. Let us see what kind of a Government it is they have in Russia which we are being daily advised is the model Government.

Something more than a year ago, by authority of the United States Senate, a subcommittee of the Senate Committee on the Judiciary conducted an exhaustive, searching, far-reaching, thoroughgoing investigation of bolshevik prapaganda in this country, and the scheming of alien Bolshevists to poison and corrupt this country, and at the same time conducted a thorough investigation of the character and nature of the Soviet Government of Russia. The hearings held as a result of this investigation lasted for months. Authentic information of the character, nature, practices, and laws of the Soviet Government of Russia was obtained. Witnesses were sworn and testimony under oath was had. The subcommittee examined and heard as witnesses many people of intelligence who had spent months in Russia since the establishment there of the Lenin and Trotski government. Some of them had spent years in Russia. They testified to many things of their own knowledge. They produced voluminous documents, duly authenticated, which showed the decrees, laws, and rulings of the Soviet Government of Russia and the facts about it.

The proceedings of these hearings were published. A summary of them was set forth in a report made by the subcommittee. The announcements and conclusions of the subcommittee are authenticated and vouched for by it. They are based upon sworn testimony. They are based upon duly proven facts. The conclusions arrived at by the subcommittee and the announcements made by it are therefore duly accredited and well established. They are official. Not a great deal of publicity was given to these hearings, the testimony had thereat, or the conclusions of the subcommitee.

Inasmuch as the activities of the enemies of our Government which were then investigated appear to have increased instead of diminished, and as this danger appears to be growing and bearing fresh fruit, and as the people seem to be but poorly informed or indifferent in regard thereto, I shall undertake to give here some of the facts about the Russian Soviet Government brought out by these hearings and duly authenticated and accredited by the subcommittee which conducted them, in order that I may assist in making better known what sort of government exists in Russia and what sort of government it is that great numbers of people in this country are advocating and upholding as better than our Government and contending we should have.

It appears that the Government of Russia, under the general supervision of those criminal despots and anarchists, Lenin and Trotski, is divided into different jurisdictions, much as this country is divided into the different jurisdictions of the several States of the Union. Instead of being called States there they are called soviets. The proletarians of each city of any considerable size, together with the surrounding country, more or less extensive, tributary to the city and controlled by its forces, constitute a soviet or local government. Those within that jurisdiction who are permitted to take part issue the decrees which constitute the laws of that soviet or jurisdiction. Thus the laws of different soviets differ to some extent. Some are worse than others, although all are bad enough. Let us see what some of them are. Vladimir is the capital of the Province of the same name, 75 miles from Moscow. A decree issued by the soviet of the city of Vladimir follows:

Any girl having reached her eighteenth year and not having married is obliged, subject to the most severe penalty, to register at the bureau of free love of the commissariat of surveillance.

Having registered at the bureau of free love, she has the right to choose from among the men between the ages of 19 and 50 a cohabitant husband.

Remarks—(1) The consent of the man in the said choice is unnecessary. (2) The man on whom such a choice falls has no right to make any protest whatsoever against the infringement.

The right to choose from a number of girls who have reached their eighteenth year is also given to men.

The opportunity to choose a husband or wife is to be presented once a month.

The bureau of free love is autonomous.

Men between the ages of 19 and 50 have the right to choose from among the registered women, even without the consent of the latter, in the interests of the State.

Children who are the issue of these unions are to become the property of the State.

It appears that in the jurisdiction of that soviet "marriage," such as it is, is contracted to last but a month, and that at the end of a month either party may dissolve it at will, without cause or formality, by contracting another "marriage" for a month with another partner, and that this performance may be repeated ad infinitum once a month. Children resulting from such cohabitant state become the property of the State.

The decree states further that it has been based on the "Excellent example of similar decrees already issued at Luga, Kolpin, and other places." A similar proclamation of provisional rights in connection with the socialization of women in the city of Hvelinsk and vicinity has been published in the Local Gazette of the workers' and soldiers' deputies of Hvelinsk. That may be considered bad enough, but note the decree or code governing the soviet of Saratov! The Bolshevists of Vladimir, Luga, Kolpin, Hvelinsk, and so forth, are conservatives as compared with those of the city of Saratov. Saratov is the tenth largest city in Russia, with a population of 217,000. A decree, dated March 15, 1918, issued by the anarchists' soviet of Saratov, which was charged by Lenin and Trotski with the government of the city of Saratov and surrounding country, follows:

I ask that the extract be printed in the RECORD as a part of my remarks without reading. It is not fit to read in public.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GERRY in the chair). Without objection, permission is granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

This decree is proclaimed by the free association of anarchists in the town of Saratov. In compliance with the decision of the soviet of peasants and soldiers and workmen's deputies of Kronstadt, the abolition of the private possession of women.

Social inequalities and legitimate marriage having been a condition in the past which served as an instrument in the hands of the bourgeoisie, thanks to which all the best species of all the beautiful women have been the property of the bourgeoisie, have prevented the proper continuation of the human race. Such ponderous arguments have induced the present organization to edict the following decree:

1. From March 1 the right to possess women having reached the ages 17 to 32 is abolished.

2. The age of women shall be determined by birth certificate or passports or by the testimony of witnesses, and on failure to produce documents their age shall be determined by the black committee, who shall judge them according to appearance.

3. This decree does not affect women having five children.

4. The former owners may retain the right of using their wives without awaiting their turn.

5. In case of resistance of the husband he shall forfeit the right of the former paragraph.

6. All women according to this decree are exempted from private ownership and are proclaimed the property of the whole nation.

7. The distribution and management of the appropriated women in compliance with the decision of the above said organization are transferred to the Anarchist Saratov Club. In three days from the publication of this decree all women given by it to the use of the nation are obliged to present themselves to the given address and give the required information.

8. Before the black committee is formed for the realization of this decree, the citizens themselves shall be charged with such control. Remarks: Each citizen knowing a woman not submitting herself to the address under this decree is obliged to let it be known to the anarchist's club, giving the full address, full name, and father's name of the offending woman.

9. Male citizens have the right to use one woman not oftener than three times a week, for three hours, observing the rules specified below.

10. Each man wishing to use a piece of public property should be a bearer of certificate from the factories committee, professional union, or workmen's, soldiers', and peasants' council, certifying that he belongs to the working family class.

11. Every working member is obliged to discount 2 per cent from his earnings to the fund of general public action. Remarks: This committee in charge will put these discounting funds with the specifications of the names and lists into the State banks and other institutions, handing down these funds to the popular generation.

12. Male citizens not belonging to the working class in order to have the right equally with the proletariat are obliged to pay 100 rubles monthly into the public funds.

13. The local branch of the State bank is obliged to begin to reserve the payments to the national generation funds.

14. All women proclaimed by this decree to be national property will receive from the funds an allowance of 238 rubles a month.

15. All women who are pregnant are released of the direct State duties for four months, up to three months before and one month after childbirth.

16. Children born are given to an institution for training after they are 1 month old, where they are trained and educated until they are 17 years of age at the cost of the public funds.

17. In case of a birth of twins the mother is to receive a prize of 200 rubles.

18. All citizens, men and women, are obliged to watch carefully their health and to make each week an examination of urine and blood. Remark: The examinations are to be made daily at the laboratories of the popular generation health.

19. Those who are guilty of spreading venereal disease will be held responsible and severely punished.

20. Women having lost their health may apply to the Soviet for a pension.

21. The chief of anarchists will be in charge of perfecting the temporary arrangements and technical measures concerning the realization of this decree.

22. All those refusing to recognize and support this decree will be proclaimed sabotage, enemies of the people, and counter anarchists, and will be held to the severest responsibilities.

(Signed) COUNCIL OF THE CITY OF SARATOV, RUSSIA.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, could anything be more horrible and shocking? It is astounding and beyond comprehension that such a state of affairs can exist in the world of to-day, in any country which has ever claimed to be even semicivilized. It is shocking beyond expression to every sense of decency. It is worse than the practices of the most barbarous tribes of darkest Africa. Even among them a sort of mating of the sexes, a crude form of matrimony, is recognized and upheld. This beats the heathen. This is recognized, legalized, universal prostitution. It sinks to a lower depth than dumb brutes. Russia is a disgrace to the world. It is astounding that there are women in this country who uphold bolshevism and speak tolerantly of the Soviet Government of Russia. What are we to think of them?

As a result of this promiscuous intercourse of the sexes without pretense of mating or matrimony, commanded and sanctioned by law, no child is to know its parents. The identity of its father can never be known. At the tender age of 1 month all children are to be taken from their mothers and put in State foundling nurseries. They are to be kept there and supported by the State until 17 years of age, and then they are to be turned loose to shift for themselves—the boys to hunt jobs, the girls to fall into prostitution. In proof of this, I quote from an official decree, as follows:

The children born are given to an institution for training after they are 1 month old, where they are trained and educated until they are 17 years of age at the cost of the public funds.

Children thus torn from their mothers before they know the mothers are entered in State foundling nurseries and registered merely by numbers. They are to have no names. Even the names of the mothers are not to attach to them or be known. No child will ever know who was its father or mother.

They have utterly destroyed marriage, the home, the fireside, the family, the corner stones of all civilization, all society. They have undertaken to destroy what God created and ordained. They defy alike the will of God, the precepts of Christianity, the decrees of civilization, the customs of society. It is hard to realize that such things exist and are tolerated by the civilized world.

How the Soviet Government of Russia was established, after Lenin and Trotski and their hellish coconspirators had overthrown the very respectable Kerensky government and obtained control of Russia, is disclosed by the hearings of the subcommittee to which I have referred. I quote therefrom:

The dictatorship, utilizing Lettish troops and Chinese laborers, as well as to some extent German and Austrian prisoners and criminals discharged from the jails as its so-called Red Guard to enforce its decrees, promptly secured possession and control of:

(a) All arms and ammunition.

(b) Practically all foodstuffs and commodities essential to the maintenance of life.

(c) All clothing and household goods necessary for warmth and health.

(d) All gold, silver, and specie, including jewelry, ornaments, gold and silver plate.

This was accomplished by means of confiscation followed by the nationalization and monopolizing by the State of all commercial, industrial, and financial enterprises. Having secured possession of all of these instruments of physical and economic power and domination, this dictatorship was enabled to enforce the submission of most of the population to its will. The rank and file of the people of Russia had no other choice. They could not resist or oppose the Bolsheviki with force, as they were without firearms and without ammunition. They could not refuse to obey its dictates else they would be starved to death. They could not defy the dictators, as they would be left without raiment. They could not sustain life with money possessing an intrinsic value, for they had none, and thousands have been starved to death and murdered as a result of this régime.

Possessing, therefore, every instrument necessary for the exercise of the forcible persuasion of the populace, it became expedient to reinforce the dictatorship with an increased man power. Recognizing the state of the public mind, it was necessary to guard against betrayal by those who were drafted into the service of the State, and the most effective weapons selected to secure the faithful execution of the will of the dictators were fear, terrorism, and a system of hostages. By this system of hostages the relatives, family, and loved ones of the drafted subject were held as prisoners, their food supply, their clothing, even their lives depending upon the fidelity with which the dictatorship was supported and its orders executed.

Disfranchisement on a wholesale scale is practiced by the villains who are in control of Russia. Practically everybody who is not part and parcel of their devilish schemes is disfranchised from any participation or voice in the government under which they have to live. On that score I quote further from the hearings to which I have referred:

Having professed an adherence to the democratic form of government to assist in securing control of Russia, the Bolsheviki, in establishing its paper government, sought to maintain its dictatorship under color of a representative political system. A recognition of the democratic principle that all men are created equal, however, would have necessitated the equal participation of all citizens in the affairs of government. Such universal participation in political affairs would have made impossible a dictatorship of the minority, but would inherently have been a rule of the majority and have accomplished just what the dissolution of the constituent assembly was intended to prevent. The following of the bolshevik government being more numerous in the cities, and these by reason of their concentration within more restricted territorial limits being more readily led and dominated, it was prescribed by constitutional direction that representation from cities in the government should be five times as great as the representation from the provincial districts. In other words, representation from cities is in the ratio of 1 to every 25,000 of the population, while from the rural districts and the territory of the peasants, who constitute a large percentage of the Russian population, representation is 1 to every 125,000 of the population. Even this discrimination did not adequately safeguard the domination of the bolshevik minority. Disfranchisement of large groups of the population was necessary. By constitutional provision they denied the right to participate in the government and disfranchised the following classes:

(a) All persons employing others in connection with the conduct of their business.

(b) All persons receiving interest, rents, dividends, or an income from financial or industrial enterprises.

(c) All merchants, traders, and dealers.

(d) All clergymen, priests, and employees of churches and religious bodies.

(e) Certain persons connected with the Czar's government, persons mentally afflicted, and persons convicted of certain crimes against the bolshevik government.

Even with these restrictions upon suffrage, the bolshevik government has refused to undertake the election of a constituent assembly. The elections that are permitted are conducted under supervision of the Red Guard.

Local bodies or soviets that are not satisfactory to the dictatorship are removed, and in some instances so-called commissars or officials of unquestioned loyalty to the government are imported from the cities to govern the affairs of the political unit (the local soviet) sought to be dominated according to the bolshevik faith.

Confiscation, nothing more nor less than wholesale robbery by the robbers who constitute the Russian Government, has been practiced on a wholesale plan. On that score I quote further from the hearings:

Confiscation on a wholesale scale has been used as a means of undertaking to create and maintain tangible assets that could be used as the economic foundation upon which could be built the industrial and financial superstructure of the bolshevik State. By constitutional edict and by a series of decrees issued by the dictatorship all land, forests, and natural resources of Russia have been confiscated by the government in order that the bolshevik government may become the landlord of the entire population and exercise the control incident thereto. Where a man shall live and toil and till the soil is determined by the State and the right to determine the nature and extent of each man's domicile, and the power to compel the migration of the peasant from the locality of his birth or adoption, even to the extent of separating families as the population of the various communities expands or contracts, is exercised by the bolshevik government through the laws which it has decreed for the control of the people.

The alleged purpose of the seizure of land by the government was that the right to the land might be transferred to the rank and file of the people of Russia in order that the individual Russian peasant might become the unrestrained and unrestricted architect of his own future economic development, but the methods adopted by the Bolsheviki have merely transferred the landlordship from the large landowners, and in many instances from the peasant groups themselves, to the bolshevik government, and the present control by that government is not confined to the land itself, as was the control of the landowners under the old regime, but extends as well to the persons and even the tools, implements, and products of the peasants. The aged and infirm are deprived of all right to utilize and enjoy during their declining years the soil their efforts may have enriched, because their physical strength makes them powerless to perform all of the labor incident to its full cultivation. They thereupon become mere pensioners of the State. This system guarantees to the peasant only the present enjoyment of a given piece of land, and consequently only warrants him in so utilizing the beneficence of the State in according him the right to use the same as to insure the maximum present production to the exclusion of a scientific development that will inure to future advantage. In other words, an uncertain tenure is naturally accompanied by an exploitation rather than by a systematic development of the leasehold interest. Under this system the peasant can never become the owner of the land he tills or of any other land. To aid in the system and to establish a larger control of peasant activities by the government the principle of confiscation has also been invoked in the case of all live stock and all agricultural implements, and as a consequence these essential instruments of land cultivation, these chattels necessary to the production of both meat and vegetable foodstuffs, have become, without regard to the rights of former owners or the advantage to the individual of future ownership thereon, the property of the bolshevik government, and the only right thereto that the peasant can in the future acquire is a use upon such terms and conditions as the government may prescribe.

As may well be expected, there seems to be much difficulty in determining the manner in which this policy is being carried into actual operation, and it is apparent that only by the application of arbitrary methods can the already existing articles in these categories be made useful to any portion of the peasant population or be adequately protected and maintained so as to preserve their value. It is also interesting to contemplate, but dubious to predict, how meat-food products can under this system be maintained at a sufficient quantity to sustain life.

The thrift, industry, perseverance, and intelligence which has enabled a portion of the Russian people in the past to acquire and save money has also been penalized by the confiscation of all banks and banking institutions and their transformation into a state monopoly.

Confiscation under the milder term of nationalization has eliminated from all industrial establishments, such as factories, mills, and mines, the business acumen and scientific methods necessary to successful operation and competitive methods. The absolute control of their operation and management is placed in the hands of the employees. This has been followed by the stagnation of the industrial life of the country, and even those nationalized industries which have been able to operate under Government control have operated at an enormous percentage of loss, the deficiencies being met from the unlimited issue of fiat paper money printed by the Government. The nationalization of the enterprises essential to the production and delivery of raw materials has so handicapped their production as to restrict the quantity of raw materials available for the maintenance of industrial enterprises, and the whole economic condition of Russia has made it impossible to secure relief from foreign sources. These industrial conditions can only continue so long as the Government can succeed in monopolizing the means of subsistence, maintain an adequate military force to enforce the decrees of the dictatorship, and force the recognition of worthless fiat paper money as the basis of its financial system.

As the economic formula of the Bolsheviki prescribes the confiscation of the property rights of others, likewise it proclaims the doctrine of the repudiation of financial obligations, and the debts of Russia have been renounced. Repudiation is also invoked to secure the government against the incumbrances upon and liabilities of the property and assets of enterprises, land, and chattels seized by it under its confiscation program. This repudiation also aided materially in suppressing and exterminating the creditor class, which naturally constitutes a part of the element that the Bolsheviki are pleased to call the bourgeoisie, or capitalistic class, by depriving them of the right and ability to recover and utilize the earnings, savings, and accumulations of the past. As it affected them it was a form of confiscation. Repudiation is therefore a consistent accompaniment of confiscation and an essential element in the process of destruction. The financial condition of the dictatorship, however, required the adoption of some constructive policy that would finance it. It was necessary to maintain at least a color of legitimacy, an appearance of honest business methods, in supporting its so-called red army and in securing control of the articles necessary to sustain life. Further than that it was desirable to devise ways and means by which service in the red army and employment in nationalized enterprises might appear sufficiently attractive and at the same time give an appearance of prosperity to the government itself, in order that hope as well as fear might assist in maintaining the Bolshevik government. The policy adopted was the printing of unlimited amounts of fiat paper money unsecured by any reserve. This naturally furnished to the government a cash capital limited only by the capacity of the printing presses of the government, which in turn had been confiscated and nationalized. Already it is estimated that a sum in excess of 30,000,000,000 rubles has been put into circulation. This has created a ridiculously inflated circulating medium of no material value to the public, but of enforced value to the government.

Compulsory military service is ruthlessly enforced. I quote further:

Repudiating the doctrine of all radical revolutionary groups throughout the world that have claimed for the individual of all lands the right of conscientious objection for religious or other reason against the bearing of arms and the participation in armed conflicts, the Bolsheviki have adopted as the essential safeguard of their political fabric compulsory military service. As Prussianism found it essential to world domination by the autocracy of the Hohenzollerns, so bolshevism seized upon it as the mainstay that would weather its autocracy of the dictatorship through its campaign of confiscation and repudiation.

Courts of law have been abolished. On that score I quote:

All of the established courts and judicial institutions have been abolished and in their place have been created revolutionary tribunals. Under the dictatorship these new judicial tribunals disregard all laws that "contradict the revolutionary conception of right." In actual operation these revolutionary tribunals have tried and condemned men in their absence. No right to bail is recognized and the penalty imposed depends largely upon the caprice of the court. The death penalty, the reestablishment of which under the provisional government was vociferously denounced by the Bolsheviki, has been invoked for all sorts of crimes and misdemeanors. In fact, the procedure in the courts is a mere travesty on justice and most summary in its nature.

The existence of God is denied and religion has been banned. On that score I quote:

Every activity of the bolshevik government indicates clearly the antipathy of the Bolsheviki toward Christianity and the Christian religion. Its program is a direct challenge to that religion. The Christian church and bolshevism can not both survive the program that is being developed by the Russian dictatorship and which it is undertaking to extend throughout the world. Not only have they confiscated all church property, real and personal, but they have established the right of antireligious propaganda as a constitutionally recognized institution. Church and school have been divorced even to the extent of suppressing the Sunday school, and the teaching of all religious doctrines in public, either in schools or educational institutions of any kind, is expressly forbidden. Religion can only be taught or studied privately. All church and religious organizations are prohibited from owning property of any kind. All recognition of a Supreme Being in both governmental and judicial oaths is abolished. The clergy and all servants or employees of church bodies are expressly disfranchised and deprived of all right to hold public positions. The full significance of the attitude of the Bolsheviki toward Christianity is most fully manifested in the fact that, though by Russian custom and decree under the old régime every newspaper or periodical published on Easter Sunday in the Russian Empire was required to carry the headline, "Christ is risen," on Easter Sunday in 1918 all bolshevik papers substituted for this sacred sentiment the headline and slogan, "One hundred years ago to-day Karl Marx was born." Thus the issue has been framed between the gospel of Karl Marx and the teachings of Christ. We reiterate, therefore, that bolshevism and the Christian religion can not both survive.

All freedom of speech and freedom of the press has been abolished. I quote further:

The freedom of the press and of speech, though heralded by the advocates of bolshevism as necessary to the intelligent participation of the people in popular government, has been abrogated in Russia, and by the usual confiscatory method of the accepted formula all of the mechanical devices and materials necessary for the publication of periodicals and all places of meeting and public assemblage have been seized by the bolshevik government.

To make the control more complete and effective, the publication of all advertisements, whether in regularly published periodicals or on handbills or programs, is made a monopoly of the government. As a consequence the people of Russia are deprived of all facts, literature, and public expression through the medium of the press or public meetings, except such as is approved by the dictatorship and has been passed by its censorship.

In summary the subcommittee in its report says of the character of the Russian Government:

The salient features which constitute the program of bolshevism as it exists to-day in Russia and is presented to the rest of the world as a panacea for all ills may be summarized as follows:

(1) The repudiation of democracy and the establishment of a dictatorship.
(2) The confiscation of all land and the improvements thereon.
(3) The confiscation of all forests and natural resources.
(4) The confiscation of all live stock and all agricultural implements.
(5) The confiscation of all banks and banking institutions and the establishment of a State monopoly of the banking business.
(6) The confiscation of all factories, mills, mines, and industrial institutions and the delivery of the control and operation thereof to the employees therein.
(7) The confiscation of all churches and all church property, real and personal.
(8) The confiscation of all newspapers and periodicals and all mechanical facilities and machinery used in the publication thereof.
(9) The seizure and confiscation of all public meeting places and assembly halls.
(10) The confiscation of all transportation and communication systems.
(11) The confiscation of the entire estate of all decedents.
(12) The monopolizing by the State of all advertisements of every nature, whether in newspapers, periodicals, handbills, or programs.
(13) The repudiation of all debts against the government and all obligation due the nonbolshevik elements of the population.
(14) The establishment of universal compulsory military service, regardless of religious scruples and conscientious objections.
(15) The establishment of universal compulsory labor.
(16) The abolition of the Sunday school and all other schools and institutions that teach religion.
(17) The abscute separation of churches and schools.
(18) The establishment through marriage and divorce laws of a method for the legalization of prostitution.
(19) The refusal to recognize the existence of God in its governmental and judicial proceedings.
(20) The conferring of the rights of citizenship on aliens without regard to length of residence or intelligence.
(21) The arming of all so-called "toilers," and the disarming of all persons that had succeeded in acquiring property.
(22) The discrimination in favor of residence of cities and against residents of the rural districts through giving residents of cities five times as much voting power as is accorded to residents of rural districts in such elections as are permitted.
(23) The disfranchisement of all persons employing any other person in connection with their business.
(24) The disfranchisement of all persons receiving rent, interest, or dividends.
(25) The disfranchisement of all merchants, traders, and commercial agents.
(26) The disfranchisement of all priests, clergymen, or employees of churches and religious bodies.
(27) The denial of the existence of any inalienable rights in the individual citizen.
(28) The establishment of a judicial system exercising autocratic power, convicting persons and imposing penalties in their absence, and without opportunity to be heard, and even adopting the death penalty for numerous crimes and misdemeanors.
(29) The inauguration of a reign of fear, terrorism, and violence.

This is the program that the revolutionary elements and the so-called "parlor Bolshevists" would have this country accept as a substitute for the Government of the United States, which recognizes that "all men are created equal," and that "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" are the inalienable rights of all its citizens. This is the formula they would have adopted to supersede the Government which was established by all the people of the United States "in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity," and "promote the general welfare." The mere recital of the program is a sufficient denunciation of it and of the individuals and groups which advocate and defend it.

Upon other phases of the Russian Government I quote further from the report of the subcommittee:

The apparent purpose of the bolshevik government is to make the Russian citizen, and especially the women and children, the wards and dependents of that government. Not satisfied with the degree of dependency incurred by the economic and industrial control assumed by its functionaries, it has destroyed the natural ambition and made impossible of accomplishment the moral obligation of the father to provide, care for, and adequately protect the child of his blood and the mother of that child against the misfortunes of orphanhood and widowhood. To accomplish this it has by decree expressly abolished and prohibited all right of inheritance, either by law or will. Upon death all of the decedent's estate is confiscated by the State, and all heirs who are physically incapable of working become pensioners of the State to the extent that the assets confiscated by the government make such pensions possible.

Insurance of all kinds has been nationalized, the assets of insurance companies confiscated, and the business of insuring life, property, accident, old age, and unemployment made a State monopoly. In the attempted liquidation of existing companies and associations the liquidating representatives of the government seem only concerned in securing possession and record of all of their assets and fail to recognize the propriety of accurately adjusting their liabilities. As a consequence, those insured and the beneficiaries under existing policies find themselves without the protection for which they have been paying premiums.

During modern times the effort of civilization has been directed to lifting mankind to the highest possible level of intelligence and social and material well-being in order to attain the highest degree of social equality between man and man. For the first time since the Dark Ages has an organized government undertaken to invoke a process of equalization by establishing as the basis of social equality the minimum rather than the maximum degree of existing educational, industrial, social, and moral efficiency, yet such is the policy of the bolshevik government. It recognizes that the psychology of even the most illiterate elements of the Russian people is such that it can not perpetuate this doctrine in practice unless the same reactionary methods of equalization are simultaneously destroying the social fabric, the efficiency, the individual initiative, the ambition, and the material prosperity of the people of all other nations, whose competition and accomplishments would necessarily result in odious and destructive comparisons. Not content, therefore, in fathering in Russia this retrograde method of establishing the equality of mankind on the basis of the lowest strata of society, it has undertaken to arouse in the United States and in all other countries resentment, rancor, and hatred against those elements of society which have, by reason of their aptitude, perseverance, industry, and thrift, attained that superior degree of intelligence and prosperity that has made possible the accomplishment of twentieth century civilization. The effort of progressing civilization has always been the uplifting of man to a higher and higher plane of living and a loftier place in society.

The activities of the Bolsheviki constitute a complete repudiation of modern civilization and the promulgation of the doctrine that the best attainment of the most backward member of society shall be the level at which mankind shall find its final and victorious goal. The pulling down of the progressive rather than the lifting up of the retrogressive is presented as the doctrine of their new kind of civilization. To carry this message to the uttermost parts of the earth they have appropriated enormous sums of money, and, incidentally, their process of equalization in Russia was promoted by the starvation which the funds thus expended might have been utilized to alleviate. Their messengers and their friends have afflicted this country and their new civilization has been represented as Utopian in its nature. Many well-disposed persons have been deceived into the belief that they were promoting a social welfare movement in advocating it. They have even given their substance that it might be perpetuated and extended. Yet, while these people who have been popularly called "parlor Bolshevists" are contributing to these bolshevik agents, these same agents are appealing to the hatred and the lowest instincts of the more ignorant elements of the population, reinforced by the criminally inclined, to whom the doctrine of confiscation furnished a form of legalized robbery and a means of livelihood without physical or mental effort, to rise en masse and destroy our civilization and the so-called bourgeoise, with whom, of course, must be classed these same "parlor Bolshevists" who are assisting by lending funds and respectability to the movement in bringing the temple down upon their own heads.

The report of the subcommittee is extensive and exhaustive and contains much more startling information and sheds much more light upon conditions in Russia and the activities of Bolshevists in this country, but I will not quote further from it.

As a result of these shocking conditions in Russia, the rule of the Soviet Government, a reign of terror exists there, accompanied by wholesale murder, robbery, arson, pillage, loot, rape, licentiousness, and every other form of lawlessness. Dr. George L. Simon, a very intelligent witness who had been in Russia, testified before the subcommittee, and being asked to estimate the number of persons who had been murdered by the Bolshevists, he replied that it was in the thousands, but that no man could even approximate the number of the victims. "The Bolsheviki never investigate; they kill on the spot, as a rule," he said. More people were killed in Petrograd in one week than were killed during the entire French Revolution.

As a result of this reign of terror and crime the people of Russia are starving by hundreds of thousands. Starvation and disease are rampant in all parts of Russia. The people are not producing enough to live on and want stalks everywhere. The population of Petrograd was formerly 2,000,000. It is now reported to be 700,000. The boasted Soviet Government, the rule of the "workers," is worse than a failure.

Much valuable information about the Soviet Government of Russia, based upon the hearings conducted by the subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee and its report and upon other authentic sources of information, is contained in a valuable work, in pamphlet form, compiled by Mr. T. H. B. Patterson, of Toledo, and entitled "The White Slaver of the World." It is published by the Rights of Labor Association, at 409 Victoria Place, Toledo, Ohio, and sold at a nominal price. I am indebted to it for much information.

The time has come when we should use plain, unvarnished language, when naked facts should be stated. The time has come when the men and women of this country who are loyal should be told the plain truth about the Soviet Government of Russia, which is being eulogized and defended in this country and declared to be a better government than ours, even though the telling cause decency to falter and bring the blush of shame to those who tell and to those who hear or read.

This, in brief, is a description of the government which is daily being held up in this country as an example for us, and which is declared by some to be superior to our form of government. This is the character of government which some people in our midst would have established in this country. This is the government toward which some fairly respectable people in this country exhibit a lenient and tolerant feeling. This is the government of which there is some talk of recognition by this country. There are people in this country who declare our Government should recognize the Lenin and Trotski government of Russia as a reputable government, and that we should appoint an ambassador to it and receive an ambassador from it and with which we should, they say, conduct generally diplomatic negotiations and business, and to which we should extend full diplomatic recognition. That has been suggested by high authority in this country.

A year ago last December a public meeting was held at Poli's Theater, in this city, the Capital of this Nation, on a Sunday afternoon, at which speakers eulogized the Soviet Government of Russia and declared it a better government than our Government. A Member of Congress was present at that meeting and apparently in sympathy with its objects.

Recently at a largely attended public gathering, in a city some distance from here, I delivered an address on this theme, and in the course of my address I quoted extensively from the report of the aforementioned subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate, about these things, as I have here, showing conclusively the nature of the Soviet Government of Russia. I stated then, as I have now, that the report was based on authentic proof, on the sworn testimony of witnesses who had been in Russia, and on duly certified documentary evidence; that it was, as it is, authentic, official, and duly accredited. I was followed by a distinguished speaker of widespread note, who began his address by saying:
